He fine tunes his team members to excel in their strongest events, and he organizes his Wildcats to find success and earn the most possible points.

But he is no doctor.

And that's the one thing his team needs right now.

"We have some illnesses and injuries," Rovelto said. "On the men's side, we're close to being decimated in the distance area. We have some people so far back that it will be hard for them to get back."

Trying to make up for lost time might mean sick athletes won't get all of the in-competition practices that their teammates will, Rovelto said. When people miss practices and meets, he said, there just isn't time for it all.

He said his athletes can get in two good training days per week, and if they are sick and have to miss even one of those, it can be really hard to bounce back before weekend competition.

"In those areas, a lot of what is and is not going to get done is going to happen in training, not racing," he said. "Training is very important this time of year because there is no time to recuperate."

Among the Wildcats missing action is Will Jones, a sophomore sprinter who won the KSU Allcomers meet 60-meter dash in December. Jones has been absent since that meet with a hamstring injury.

Also, Jared MacLeod, a jumper, has suffered through a stress reaction in his fibula, a knee injury and a tight hamstring.

To top it off, distance runner Shauna Burrell is showing the first signs of mononucleosis.

Rovelto said he is not discouraged.

"If we get Will and Jared back, and the other guys remain healthy, and we can get some of the middle distance guys back on the track, we're going to be much improved," he said.

While many Wildcats are battling back from injuries and illnesses, the team did prove immune last weekend. Amy Mortimer won both the 3,000 meter and the mile run and helped the Cats capture the KU-MU triangular for the fifth-straight time.

Rovelto said he was happy with the win, but that the team has a long way to go before he issues the squad a clean bill of health.

"It was important for us to win the meet. There were some very good performances, and there were some that didn't meet our expectations," he said.

"Some of it is because an individual is not in as good of shape as he or she should be right now, and maybe sometimes it was a mistake. If we are going to compete for a championship, we can't have those things happen."

This weekend, K-State will have another chance to take its medicine.

The Cats will travel to Norman for the University of Oklahoma Invitational. Rovelto

Title IX | Law's overhauls rejected

A Bush administration advisory commission rejected a proposal Thursday to overhaul the landmark gender equity law credited with igniting a women's sports explosion. But some women's groups said the panel opened the door to such changes.

The Commission on Opportunity in Athletics considered about two dozen recommendations for Title IX during two days of sometimes contentious meetings. The most sweeping recommendations failed to pass — one proposal produced a 7-7 tie — but the panel endorsed allowing the Education Department to tinker with the ways students and athletes are counted to measure compliance with the law.

Michael Jordan said thanks, but no thanks.

Jordan turned down offers from Tracy McGrady and Allen Iverson to relinquish their starting spots in the All-Star Game.

McGrady, the Orlando guard who led the Eastern Conference in fan balloting, made his offer Thursday. Iverson made a similar offer in a private phone call a week and a half ago, Jordan revealed before Thursday night's game between the Bucks and Washington Wizards.

NBA | Stojakovic selected to replace Webber

Due to Chris Webber's ankle injury, Peja Stojakovic will be an All-Star for the second straight season.

NBA commissioner David Stern selected Stojakovic as Webber's replacement Thursday, allowing the Sacramento Kings to remain represented on the court at the league's showcase event.

Webber will miss at least three weeks with a sprained left ankle, the same injury that sidelined him for the first 20 games last season.

NFL | Mariucci meets with Lions owner

Former San Francisco 49ers coach Steve Mariucci interviewed for the Detroit Lions head coach vacancy Thursday.

Mariucci arrived Wednesday evening in Detroit to tour Ford Field and meet with Bill Ford, team vice chairman and Ford Motor Co.'s chairman and chief executive. Mariucci spent most of Thursday at the Lions' training facility in Allen Park before heading home, team president Matt Millen said in a statement.

Fabricated life makes for good film topic

"CONFESSIONS OF A DANGEROUS MIND"

Movie review by JJ Duncan

What do you believe when the jerk who created "The Dating Game" and "The Gong Show" tells you he was a cool, collected CIA killer by night?

Probably none of it, but it makes a good movie.

Chuck Barris, the creator of several gameshows in the 1960s and '70s, released "Confessions of a Dangerous Mind" in 1984, a book in which he was the main character, leading a double life as a gameshow host and a CIA operative. The truth of the unauthorized autobiography (which is almost an oxymoron in itself) will neither be confirmed nor denied by Barris, as he said in a Dec. 30 interview on CNN.

So how do you bring a story to the big screen that is possibly the fictional egotistical rantings of a burned-out TV producer?

Ignore the truth and focus on the story. At least that's how writer Charlie Kaufman ("Being John Malkovich," "Adaptation") and George Clooney, in his directorial debut, handled the movie.

The movie starts out by making sure everyone understands how utterly despicable Barris is by showing him as a shady producer-wannabe who routinely does whatever it takes, but often fails, to get girls in bed. Enter Sam Rockwell, who is probably best remembered for his stand-out performance as Wild Bill in "The Green Mile."

The team of Rockwell and Clooney turns out to make this project work. By keeping every other actor on an almost one-dimensional level, Clooney is able to make Rockwell's stylish brand of entropy stand out.

Rockwell's acting is dead-on for both sides of this double life. The cheesy smile and greasy demeanor of a gameshow host and the cool ambition of a government assassin are both mastered.

He almost makes the movie surreal. In one scene, you see him lie for sex, then go get in a bar fight. In another, you see him drop a man into a well and do a little Temptations-esque spin.

Clooney creates a world that seems obsessed with being something great.

In one scene, Julia Roberts' character asks, "Why is it that no one has delusions of being an insurance salesman?" Clooney and Kaufman seem to knowingly let the question define the movie.

Barris was a gameshow host, but maybe it wasn't enough. Maybe he had to concoct this delusion about himself so he felt like he was more than a despised and seedy TV executive.

This is where the idea transcends the story. Barris becomes like so many other self-deluded Americans who can't deal with the confines of a normal life in a boring society where the only exciting aspects of life involve the pursuit of sex.

Then again, maybe Barris is telling the truth.

DARKNESS FALLS

Film plays on human fear, lacks originality

"DARKNESS FALLS"

Movie review by Wendy Gorman

On some level, everybody is afraid of the dark.

"Darkness Falls" plays off this assumption by using standard horror-movie devices that doubtlessly will frighten the more nervous-type viewers.

The flick manages to hit home on a couple of points, but lacks in originality, never forcing the audience to think in a new way.

The movie opens with a narration of the tale of Matilda Dickson, who years ago resided in the town of Darkness Falls.

The sweet old lady, nicknamed "the Tooth Fairy" for her habit of giving children coins when they lost their teeth, was disfigured by a fire and doomed to wear a Jason-type porcelain mask. She could not go outside during the day.

Eventually, she is accused of killing two village children and is hanged. In typical wrongfully accused fashion, Matilda uses her last breath to lay a curse on the village.

Flash forward to modern times. Young Kyle Walsh is in good shape. He has just lost his last baby tooth, and he's going to take his crush, Caitlin, to a dance. Then he has a run-in with the Tooth Fairy, who kills his mom.

Now she won't rest until she gets Kyle, who develops the habit of never setting foot in even the barest hint of shadow. Kyle is taken away to spend years in foster homes and mental hospitals.

Twelve years later, Caitlin (Emma Caufield) finds her little brother, Michael (Lee Cormie) suffering in a strange manner; he won't sleep and is scared to death of the dark. She is reminded of Kyle's former behavior and gives him a call.

Kyle (Chaney Kley) obligingly makes the trip back to Darkness Falls to see if he can help Michael.

Unfortunately, Kyle is still scared stiff of darkness and apparently survives on antidepressants.

It's hard to have very high expectations for horror movies, but "Darkness Falls" actually gets a few things right. By and large, people don't like being alone in the dark, and the movie plays off that fact.

The characters pretty much act like cowards when they are alone in the dark – dropping things and cursing.

Though the actors all basically unknowns, they do an adequate job. None of them deliver a stellar, or even very memorable performance, but at least they don't try to milk the story for more than it's worth.

However, the movie is like most horror movies: laughable, even when it's scary. When Caitlin is running from the Tooth Fairy in the hospital and runs right past every emergency light, you want to reach out and hit her upside the head for her stupidity.

And, of course, Kyle leaves his bag of flashlights in an elevator that's about to fall down the shaft rather than clutching it to his chest for dear life, as any rational human would.

There is potential for terror, but this potential is wrecked by the fact that watchers get too much face time with the Tooth Fairy. She gets more than her fair share of close-ups, so the audience becomes entirely too familiar with her featureless porcelain visage.

Is "Darkness Falls" a predictable movie? Sure it is.

Will it make anybody want to sleep with the lights on? It just might.

Exies make bland effort in release, create boring sound

"INERTIA"

Album review by Matthew Webber

Inertia n. 1. Resistance or disinclination to motion, action, or change. 2. The new album by the Exies.

The Exies choose names as unfortunately as other people's parents. The "the" in front of their name connotes an affinity with the Strokes, the White Stripes and the Funky Bunch, although 4 Windows Up or Matchbox 20 would be more apt.

Their album title, "Inertia," encapsulates how resistant to changing the radio they are and how disinclined I am to distinguish them from Tonic.

This doesn't mean the Exies are crap. It just means they're static.

"Rolling Stone" designated the Exies one of its ten "Next Wave" artists, perhaps off the strength of their single, "My Goddess." One of the better decisions the Exies made was starting off "Inertia" with this song, which raises your expectations for the rest of the album. With its fast and loud guitars and faster, louder vocals, "My Goddess" is destined to be a hit, and MTV2 has added it to its playlist.

Although "My Goddess" hits hard like Super Macho Man, the other songs on "Inertia" hit more like Don Flamenco. "Rolling Stone" describes their sound as "super-radio-friendly-hard-rock," which just about sum 41s it up. They don't sound as raw as the aforementioned garage bands. They don't rage against any who-says-white-boys-can't-rap machinations.

They sound instead like the third type of rock band on the radio's vertical horizon. Exies, this is how you remind me of Nickelback: Your album sounds sterile, like hospital music with distortion. Your album sounds like something Matt Serletic produced, which is probably because it is.

Technically, it's perfect. Sonically, it's boring.

I wished they sounded more like Stone Temple Pilots, to whom "Rolling Stone" compared them, but they resemble STP like Poison resembles Motley Crue. True, the Exies' lead singer, Scott Stevens, sings in a raspy voice like Scott Weiland, but so do I when I have a sore throat.

It's easy for me to be harsh on any band "Rolling Stone" champions, so I'm being much meaner. The Exies don't suck, but they don't exactly rock. "Can't Relate" and "No Secrets" are good songs, and nothing on "Inertia" is horrible, which really is the best I can say.

If I had to write a one-word blurb for their advertisements, I'd offer them "bland," "benign" and "innocuous." They might sound better live, without their Pro Tools gloss, but on record they sound as rough as a baby's behind. If they kicked more behind, they'd be a better band. They wouldn't sound like Stroke 9.

and I think K-State could surprise Oklahoma this Saturday.

But Wooldridge's players must stay within themselves.

K-State's women likely won't be reeling after their loss to Iowa State. The Cats understand what they have to do without Koehn, and they will be favored against the Sooners when Saturday rolls around.

K-State will be eager to get back on the court, and will give Oklahoma a good effort.

The men have a long way to go to prove they can compete consistently with the conference's best teams, but they also will be a hungry team after the A&M loss.

Both teams will benefit from staying in their systems.

And both will continue to grow as their players commit to staying within themselves.

OKLAHOMA | Open week allows men to focus on offense

being efficient at the free-throw line and playing tough defense."

K-State has held the edge in all those phases during its two Big 12 wins this season. Opponents have shot under 32 percent from the field, the Wildcats have outrebounded by an average of 15 per contest and free-throw shooting is at nearly 70 percent.

But in three loses, the stats are reversed.

That's why the focus of the open week has been to find ways to remedy that, forward Marques Hayden said.

"Coach has preached to us not only this week but all year to play to our identity," he said. "Our identity is to get down and play defense. We have to do that this weekend. Outside of that, we'll find out who wants it more."

Hayden, who was recruited heavily by Oklahoma, said this game is a little more special for him personally.

However, he said, personal accomplishments aren't what he's about come Saturday.

"I'm more concerned with getting a W on the board," Hayden said. "Right now we're 2-3 in the Big 12, and me having a big game might help me out, but getting that W, that would be great."

No. 6 Oklahoma (14-3, 5-1) vs. K-State (11-7, 2-3)

When: 12:45 p.m., Saturday
Where: Bramlage Coliseum (13,340)
Key stat: Oklahoma had early second-half runs in both victories over K-State last season

The difference in getting that W may lie in whether K-State's defense can shut down the Sooners' silky-smooth shooting tandem of Hollis Price and Ebi Ere. Both rank in the top 15 in scoring and are OU's top two threats from behind the arc.

That will put more pressure on getting loose rebounds, Hayden said. Second-chance points are not an option.

"OU is probably one of the best offensive rebounding teams in the country," Hayden said. "So we have to get those guys blocked out. If they just get one shot per possession, I think things will be all right."

TRACK | Coach hopes healthy team meets Huskers

said he is not taking a full team and the meet won't be scored, but the competition will be a good opportunity for his athletes to warm up for the next weekend.

The Cats will enter the land of the Huskers a week from Saturday and compete on the same track where the Big 12 Conference meet will be held on Feb. 28 and March 1.

"We aren't sure who all is going to be there, but we are taking 50 athletes – mostly jumpers and throwers," he said.

"Next week will be important. We will be at a facility where the conference meet is, and there will be more people running in their primary events."

Rovelto said that by the time the team travels to Nebraska, he hopes to have many athletes back in the lineup. But, he isn't ruling out unexpected injuries and illness.

"I can't let it get aggravating," he said.

"It happens. Other teams get sick and hurt, too. It's hard to stop some of these things when they are attending class on a large campus and around so many students. Kids will be kids. It's pretty hard to avoid."

WOMEN | Koehn injured; offense looks elsewhere

conference like we did is definitely going to get us refocused," Wecker said. "Now we can just go and play like we know we can."

With a large part of the Wildcat offense sidelined due to injury in the form of Koehn, K-State will need better performances from its other stars this weekend in Norman.

"It's critical that everyone on the floor assume responsibility for maximizing what they bring," Patterson said. "We didn't have that last night, and I think that's part of the process we're going through right now."

Leading the Cats' charge will be Wecker, who averages 20.3 points and 8.5 rebounds per game. Junior Nicole Ohlde (18.4 ppg, 8.4 rpg) and sophomore Megan Mahoney (13.5 ppg, 6.1 rpg) will also look to fill in some of the gaps left behind by Koehn's absence.

Oklahoma will counter with a talented backcourt that features junior Maria Villarroel (16.3 ppg, 4.5 rpg) and freshman Dionnah Jackson (12.6 ppg, 6.4 rpg) in a game that's as much about keeping everyone involved on offense as winning, Patterson said.

"I almost feel like a switch has gone on, and we're on the floor with this new team now," Patterson said. "We just have to find a way, to the best of our abilities, to find solutions."

CUTS | Foreign policy may affect city, state budget

have a better idea on how to deal with budget issues by the end of May.

"After the Legislature meets and revenue from sales taxes comes in, the commission will be better prepared to make a decision," he said.

Fehr said the Commission began to prepare for budget problems when then-Gov. Graves slashed demand transfers in half last year.

"We started taking measures into account the last quarter of last year," he said. "We've done several major changes to reduce expenditures already. We have a selective hiring freeze in place, and we've delayed capital purchases."

With last year's revenue surplus and a surprising sales-tax collection stronger than previous years, Fehr said the city was well prepared.

"We finished a lot stronger at the end of last year than we planned to," he said. "Last year, I instructed department heads to make only necessary expenditures, so we were already in a reduced spending mode."

Hayen said demand transfer cuts for 2003 are immediate.

"State demand transfers go directly into the city's general fund," he said. "That general fund is the heartbeat of the city. It pays for things like the fire department, parks and rec, public works, community development and paychecks for most city employees."

Hayen said an increase in property taxes is also a possibility, but Fehr said the commission is hesitant.

"Raising property taxes isn't an option the commission has been too interested in doing," Fehr said. "We're hoping to hold the line on property taxes."

Fehr said there is plenty of time to make a decision, but with more cuts looming in the future, it becomes more challenging.

Hayen agreed.

"Next year, it's going to be equally as bad," he said. "We may have to reduce services by some amount equal to $800,000 next year if demand transfers don't return. This money won't reappear soon. It may take as long as 2005 or 2006 to recover."

Hayen said foreign policy could worsen budget problems in 2004.

"A conflict in Iraq could decrease sales taxes locally, meaning less income for the city," he said.

These are the issues the commission will be considering as it determines the budget for fiscal year 2004, Hayen said.

"We have to find a way to fix next year's problems when already starting with less money in bank," he said.

EUROPE | Supporters debate over Iraq proceedings

rest of Europe, including those countries of the former communist East, largely supported the United States.

French Foreign Minister Dominique de Villepin said the article "contributed to the debate" over how to proceed with Iraq and was not a sign of growing divisions in Europe.

"We are not seeking to pit one Europe against another, as everyone sees we defend the same principles," de Villepin told the French Senate on Thursday.

Hungary, one of the signers, refused to comment further Thursday. Greece – which currently holds the EU presidency – said the letter did not reflect an official EU position.

But while an Athens spokesman said Greece was not asked to sign the editorial, he said Greece did not disagree with its contents.

The Journal noted the op-ed article in its lead front-page story that said it was a sign of "further shifting (of) the global political calculus toward support for war."

The letter said said Europe must remain solidly behind the effort to disarm Iraq.

"We must remain united in insisting that his (Saddam's) regime be disarmed. The solidarity, cohesion and determination of the international community are our best hope of achieving this peacefully. Our strength lies in unity," the article said.

The letter said Europe has "a common responsibility to face this threat. Failure to do so would be nothing less that negligent to our own citizens and to the wider world."

The article also warned the United Nations that it must not allow Saddam to violate Security Council Resolution 1441 which returned inspectors to Baghdad in November and gave the Iraqi leader one last chance to disarm or prove that he had destroyed weapons of mass destruction.

of Gamma Phi Beta are anxious.

This is a Wednesday night tradition, Ellen Gasser, sophomore in elementary education said.

"It's fun to come together and have food and stuff," she said. "It's a giant slumber party."

The suspense is what makes it appealing, Gasser said, as well as "the dream of being in a princess fairy-tale situation just like the person, and getting to have all these really hot guys to choose from."

"The Bachelorette" is one example of a phenomenon that started with the original "Survivor" and has grown into a genre of its own – reality television.

The New York Times reported Saturday that reality shows won 15 of 18 half-hour time periods on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday nights, and finished second in the other three time slots. "American Idol," on Fox, led the way, drawing 25 million viewers two nights running and becoming the most-watched non-sports show in the network's history.

The success of shows like "American Idol," "The Bachelorette" and "Joe Millionaire" on Fox was so impressive that many network executives said they were ready to embrace plans for a radical restructuring of the network business, the Times reported.

Reality shows are expected to flood networks' schedules next fall as well.

"There's one argument that says the electronic nature of our culture has led people more and more to relate to the world through the electronic media," psychology professor Leon Rappoport said. "Reality TV shows are kind of a substitute for life experience."

One explanation for the popularity of these shows, he said, is a psychology theory – possible selves – that suggests all people have different dimensions of their self concept they can bring up depending on the situation.

"The idea of reality TV shows allows people to sort of vicariously experience adventures or dramatic life possibilities," Rappoport said.

Reality shows are also like a lottery, he said.

"The idea is that one person can succeed and others fail, and in principle that's sort of similar to a lottery," he said. "The idea that, by some stroke of fate, you could be selected to become the bride of a millionaire, or that you could be selected by fate to win out in some sort of reality contest – it has a similarity to a lottery."

Many of the reality shows, such as "Survivor," "Fear Factor" and "Road Rules," combine social interaction with challenging physical aspects. Men and women compete against each other performing dangerous stunts, eating bizarre foods and facing adverse circumstances.

Rappoport compared it to the spectacle of gladiators in the Coliseum.

"Some commentator said the only thing we lack is actually letting people kill each other, so there is that sort of analogy to the gladiators – at least where there are these physical competitions," he said.

The appeal of reality TV results from the combination of several elements, Rappoport said.

"The combination of the eternal human predisposition to enjoy watching other people go through stressful, challenging, nasty situations," he said. "But now, instead of having to go to the arena, we just plug in our TV."

America mourns, reflects on NASA shuttle explosion

By David Crary
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

United again in sorrow, Americans mourned the deaths of the space shuttle astronauts at church services Sunday, while investigators mobilized to determine what went wrong. Search crews – some on horseback, some in helicopters – tracked charred debris across Texas and Louisiana.

"I don't know that we'll ever find all these pieces," said Sheriff Thomas Kerss, overseeing the hunt for hundreds, possibly thousands, of bits of wreckage strewn over Nacogdoches County after the shuttle burst apart above Texas.

At churches across America, at the Johnson Space Center in Houston, at a U.S. Army base in Afghanistan, even in the Iraq National Assembly, the loss of the seven Columbia astronauts gave rise to grief and reflection.

"A lot of things occur, we just wonder why and how," said Jim Andreini, 58, attending a service at Grace Brethren Church in Westerville, Ohio. "We like to think it's all part of the plan. Sometimes it's hard to understand."

Officials said the collected debris would be trucked to Barksdale Air Force Base in Louisiana for analysis by engineering experts. Their findings will be part of a NASA investigation aimed at discovering why the shuttle disintegrated Saturday, just moments from its scheduled landing in Florida.

NASA chief Sean O'Keefe said investigators, though open to all possibilities, would focus initially on whether insulation from a fuel tank caused damage during Columbia's Jan. 16

NASA reports temperature rise in shuttle

By Paul Recer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. – Just before it disintegrated, space shuttle Columbia experienced an unexpected, 60-degree rise in temperature and automatically started adjusting its path, suggesting its heat-protection tiles were missing or damaged, NASA said Sunday.

Shuttle program manager Ron Dittemore said the engineering data showed a rise of 20 to 30 degrees in the left wheel well about seven minutes before communication was lost with the spacecraft. Then there was a rise of about 60 degrees over five minutes in the middle left side of the fuselage, he said.

The sharp rise was followed by increased drag on the spacecraft that caused its automated flight system to adjust its path, he said.

"We've got some more detective work. But we're making progress inch by inch."

Ron Dittemore | SHUTTLE PROGRAM MANAGER

Dittemore cautioned that the information was preliminary but said it could suggest that the thermal tiles that are designed to protect the shuttle from burning up during re-entry into Earth's atmosphere were damaged or missing, possibly from an episode earlier in the shuttle's flight.

"We've got some more detective work. But we're making progress inch by inch," Dittemore said.

The sensors are underneath the thermal tiles.

The left side of the spacecraft has been the focus of suspicion almost from the start. Investigators are focusing on whether a broken off piece of insulation from the big external fuel tank caused damage

Manhattan reserve soldiers prepare for deployment

Responsibility topic of local ceremony for area reservists and their families

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A former K-State student joined the ranks of the U.S. Army Saturday when she, along with eight other reservists, accepted their call into active military service.

Spc. Jessica Pulec felt a sense of relief when she got the call that she now had a role in the war on terrorism.

Pulec, a member of the 450th Transportation Battalion of the Army Reserves stationed in Manhattan, is now preparing for deployment.

In a deployment ceremony Saturday at Manhattan's Army Reserve Center, the soldiers and their families learned of their new responsibility as active members of the U.S. Army.

"You are a part of the best-trained, most capable army in the history of mankind," Cmdr. George Harris told the soldiers. "With those awesome capabilities comes awesome responsibilities."

Pulec said she is ready to take on those responsibilities.

"I do feel prepared," she said. "This is the stuff you train for."

It is unknown when and where the soldiers will be deployed, however, they will begin to further their training at Fort Riley until they receive additional orders.

Sgt. 1st Class Ryan Runyan will have to leave his wife and three children when he is deployed, along with his desk at Riley County Police Department.

His wife, Sharon, has reassured her children, ages 8, 16 and 18, that the sacrifices they will have to make in the coming year are part of their duties as Americans.

"I think there is so much controversy about the war that as Christians and youth it is our duty to support our soldiers despite our views on the war," she said.

Sharon Runyan has also gathered the 65 youths of the Catholic Youth Organization to adopt the nine soldiers with

Investigators call Franklin to testify

DETROIT – Court officials granted a request by prosecutors to subpoena singer Aretha Franklin to obtain information about her home that was destroyed by arson.

The Oakland County prosecutor's office wants Franklin and three other people to testify, prosecutor David Gorcyca said in a statement Thursday.

Prosecutors declined to reveal the exact contents of the petition for the subpoenas, saying it was confidential under law.

Since the Oct. 25 fire, investigators say they have tried five times to interview Franklin.

"Offers by Ms. Franklin's lawyer to answer questions on her behalf are unacceptable," Gorcyca said. "As we have repeatedly stated in the past, we need to definitively establish what facts Ms. Franklin possesses about this case, and not what her lawyer wishes us to know."

Franklin's attorney, Elbert Hatchett, said his client wants to clear up the matter and has only declined to talk to authorities because he has advised her to.

He said he advised her to not talk to officials because they could try to implicate her in the crime.

The prosecutor's office has repeatedly said Franklin is not a suspect in the crime.

Hatchett would not say if Franklin will comply with the subpoena or evoke her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Franklin was on tour in Houston when fire swept through the 10,000-square-foot home in Bloomfield Township.

An investigation determined that an accelerant was used to start the fire in three locations on the first floor of the $1.6 million home.

Keys sells $10 million

NEW YORK – Some people celebrate their birthday with a cake. Alicia Keys celebrated with a plaque recognizing 10 million in sales of her debut disc, "Songs in A Minor."

The five-time Grammy winner marked both milestones with a party hosted by her mentor, J Records founder Clive Davis.

Though she turned 22 on Saturday, the crowd of well-wishers sang "Happy Birthday" to her Wednesday night as she received the plaque from Davis.

With her long hair flowing from beneath a brown fedora, it appeared that Keys had taken out her signature braids. But when she removed the hat, the singer revealed the top of her hair – still in cornrows.

"They're always in there," she laughed.

Keys is busy in the studio working on her sophomore album.

"Everything is going to be from my heart, which is how it always is going to be," she told The Associated Press.

"The basis of it is definitely going to be the same, but me as an evolving person, it's always going to be new and different because I'm new and different."

Cole nominated for 2 Grammys

ANAHEIM, Calif. – Natalie Cole knows a little something about musical influences.

First, there was her father, Nat King Cole. Then, there were all of his friends.

"When I was growing up, I had so many musical influences I still feel a little schizophrenic," Cole told the audience at a benefit for California State University, Fullerton's arts program.

This year Cole is nominated in two Grammy categories: Best Pop Collaboration with Vocals for "Better Than Anything" with Diana Krall and Best Jazz Vocal Album for "Ask a Woman Who Knows."

Cole remembered when she was younger, her front teeth missing, and offered to sing for her father, who thought the tune would be one of his.

Instead, she sang a less-than-stellar rendition of Ella Fitzgerald's "A Tisket-A-Tasket."

"He was mortified," she recalled.

Cole, who turns 53 on Thursday, then gave a much better rendition of Fitzgerald's song.

Cole teamed with a recording of her father on "Unforgettable, With Love," which sold 14 million copies and won a Grammy for record of the year in 1991.

Chemo won't stop Iditarod competitor

WILLOW, Alaska – Musher DeeDee Jonrowe is refusing to let a grueling course of chemotherapy keep her from taking on another grueling course – the 2003 Iditarod dog sled race, which is scheduled to begin March 1.

Jonrowe, 49, was diagnosed with breast cancer in July and is recovering from treatment that sometimes left her so weak she couldn't close her hands.

"I was slapped completely flat," said Jonrowe, who has finished 19 Iditarod races.

During last year's Iditarod, Jonrowe fell away from the leaders because of exhaustion. She finished 16th.

Jonrowe discovered a lump during a self-exam. By then, the cancer had spread to her lymph nodes.

After undergoing a double mastectomy, Jonrowe began chemotherapy in mid-August.

She continued to care for her 85 sled dogs with the help of her husband, Mike, and her handler, Kelly La Marre.

Now she is testing new sleds and eager to get back to racing.

"The Iditarod is my wellness," Jonrowe said.

"It represents what I love and what God has allowed me to do in my life.

Master Plan balances parking, pedestrians

By Emily Meissen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the Master Plan looking to make K-State a more pedestrian-friendly environment, parking is not an issue that has been overlooked.

Although not specifically part of the five-year plan, parking will not be ignored when additions to the campus occur, Darwin Abbott, director of Parking Services, said.

Darwin said the Campus Development Committee has proposed adding parking garages in three locations – between Ackert Hall and Fiedler Hall, north of Justin Hall and at West Stadium.

"It will probably happen in the next several years if the university keeps going down the path it is going," Abbott said.

The long-term aim of the Master Plan is to expand campus, maintaining a core to pedestrians and bicyclists. The proposed locations for the garages would help in pushing out the perimeter and would achieve this goal, Abbott said.

"It is still going through the university to determine what the garages will be like," Abbott said. "They want it to look nice, not be ugly and not look out of place on the campus."

Gerald Carter, director of facilities planning/university architect, said it is too early in the planning stages to determine exactly when the garages would be added.

"There is no schedule yet that we are going to build 'X' parking structure now or 'Y' parking lot there," Carter said.

"The goal of the Master Plan is to show us the direction we want the campus to grow and help us make decisions in the direction campus will grow as we make modifications."

Funding is another cause for delays in adding parking.

"We are talking about borrowing $10,000 for 20 years or more," Abbott said.

"It is a substantial amount of money, so you have to have a good plan before you can take out $10,000. You have to know if you will be able to pay it back. There is a lot of thought process going into it."

Jackie McClaskey, chair of the Campus Planning Committee, said funding decisions won't be made by the committee. In general, funding can come from three sources – state building funds, private donations or user fees, such as parking passes, McClaskey said.

Abbott said the garages could include metered parking, reserved parking that would require the purchased passes or functional stalls that could be sold for different events.

Abbott said it was too soon in the planning to determine if there would be increases in parking passes or meters.

Because the Master Plan looks ahead up to 50 years, additional parking lots and a shuttle system are not excluded from the future plans, McClaskey said.

"The three garages are a start," McClaskey said.

"But we are not taking away the potential to add more parking lots, especially to the north of campus. We had a lot of focus groups with students, faculty and staff, and parking garages are what people wanted."

Benjamin Sidwell, sophomore in computer science, said he thinks parking is an issue on every college campus.

"It is inevitable," Sidwell said. "There are a lot of people in a small space. It's something that's hard to deal with practically."

Jessica Farmer, junior in family consumer science education, agreed the problem is the same on any campus.

"I think it is a moderate issue," Farmer said.

"There are other things I'd rather see, but parking is pretty important."

Student wins tuition for spring semester

More than a thousand students vie for money given away by radio station

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN
Wesley Blake, junior in finance, was the winner of free tuition for the spring semester from the Big Kat KJCK-FM 97.5 and KQLA-FM 103.5. Blake had registered at six of the 10 remote broadcasts.

T-shirts and stickers were being handed out, Miller High Life was on special, but it was a different promotion that attracted a crowd of students to Rusty's Last Chance Friday night.

Usually, an evening in Aggieville doesn't offer much with regards to furthering scholastic careers, but on this night, hanging out at a bar made Wesley Blake, junior in finance, the winner of free tuition for the spring semester.

The Big Kat KJCK-FM 97.5 and KQLA-FM 103.5 developed a contest to give one K-State student $1,430 – enough money to cover 12 credit hours for the spring semester.

Wende Horton, program director, said the aim of the contest was to raise awareness that the Big Kat had changed its frequency from 94.5 FM and at the same time better serve its student listeners.

"Our general manager has two sons in college, and I think he realized how much it costs to go to school these days," Horton said. "So he came up with the idea and we put it together."

In order to qualify for the contest, students had to be Kansas residents enrolled as full-time students at the Manhattan campus.

Registration took place at remote broadcasts that were announced on the air for 10 days leading up to the grand drawing at Rusty's.

Students were allowed to register once at each broadcast location and Horton said there had been strong turnouts at each of the events.

In total, both stations registered over 1,000 students, she said. The success of the event has the station considering holding the contest annually.

Erin Kopf, senior in apparel marketing and design, said she went to as many registrations as she could to better her chances of winning, including Little Apple Toyota, Bobby T's and BoWinkle's.

However, no matter how many times contest participants had registered, when morning show host Chad Allen stuck his hand in the box full of names Friday night, it all came down to luck of the draw.

Originally, Allen had chosen John Schlick as the winner of the money.

However, because Schlick was not in attendance, a second winner was announced.

It was then that Allen drew Blake's name, making him the official winner of the contest.

"My heart was pretty much shattered after the first drawing, but now I'm back up to extreme jubilation," Blake said.

Blake had registered at six of the 10 remote broadcasts after his mother had informed him of the promotion. He said that after registering so many times he felt his chances were about 1 in 50.

While the money given away was intended for tuition, Blake said he had other activities in mind.

"I think I'm going to have a pretty good spring break," he said.

TO THE POINT

Space travel valuable despite recent tragedy

Mission STS-107 came to an abrupt and disastrous end during space shuttle Columbia's re-entry Saturday en route to Cape Canaveral, FL.

Having spent over two weeks in orbit conducting numerous scientific tests, the seven crew members aboard lost their lives when their craft disintegrated thousands of miles above Texas.

What is most troubling about this horrific accident are the effects such missions have and the apathy and disinterest that are associated with them nowadays.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

While many recall the Challenger explosion in 1986, as many shall recall this tragedy, little attention is paid to the efforts and successes of the space research and exploration projects funded by the U.S. government.

Although the frequency and safety record of manned space missions have grown in the past decade, the inherent dangers of space travel still exist. President Bush, addressing the accident Saturday, commented on how these dangers have become "easy to overlook" for many Americans.

In addition to the peril astronauts confront in the name of science, their contributions to various fields of research are an invaluable source of knowledge unattainable for their terra-bound colleagues.

It is easy to malign the U.S. space program for the mundane nature of its more visible accomplishments (namely Tang and Velcro), but when one looks at the benefits provided to private industry through NASA research in microchips and miniaturization of components, it becomes increasingly difficult to deny the effects research related to the space industry have had on our everyday lives.

Just as with any accident of large proportions, there will be segments of the population that would not risk further manned missions due to the failure of the Columbia to safely return its crew. However, our study of space has always been, as President John Kennedy stated in an address at Rice University in 1962, a challenge "we are willing to accept, one we are unwilling to postpone, and one which we intend to win."

Saturday's loss of seven lives marked a tragic day in American history. But space missions should continue because they have changed human life forever.

REALITY BITES

TV shows make anyone seem a celebrity

FLETCHER JACOBS

America finally began to get some of those hard and fast answers last week.

The world watched with anticipation as Mojo was kicked off "Joe Millionaire" and we found out that yes, Arsenio Hall is on still television, even though some sort of dead animal has attached itself to his head where his hair used to be.

Yeah, don't pretend you don't know what I am talking about. You know what this is all about. The era of the "reality" show has arrived.

OK, now I don't watch a lot of television. Ever since Fox ripped my heart out by cutting the "Family Guy," I've cut back.

But I'm not too high and mighty to admit to reruns of "Seinfeld" and "The Simpsons," and the cooking show "All in Good Flavor" on Sunday mornings are pixels that I don't mind being shown on my screen.

And to be totally honest we don't get cable at my house. But it will be a cold day in hell when I recognize QVC, that station that always has the night sky on, and the Hallmark Channel as actual entertainment options.

So with our limited choice and the fact that one of my roommates and girlfriend, both of whom I find rather intelligent, enjoy several of these concepts, I've become exposed to this wild and strange world of "reality" shows.

These shows really have no basis in reality that I can see, other than the fact that people will do pretty much anything to get on television. We can transform ourselves and become voyeurs of physical challenges like eating animal organs or men and women falling all over each other to be chosen by the opposite sex.

We want to know what these people did before they were contestants and what they are doing now.

Now here is where I am supposed to talk about the end of civilization and how sick and twisted we've all become.

That's easy.

And to be honest, I think any question about civilization ending was answered when "Kangaroo Jack" became the top-ranking movie last week.

After watching the latest "Joe Millionaire" last week, I have only thing on my mind: where's mine? I want in.

If this goober with the slick hair can get a gig doing this, and there is a possibility that I could end up living in my parent's basement after I graduate, what the hell am I doing in college?

Have you heard this guy talk?

Wow, no wonder he's still a construction worker.

And surely you've seen some of the singing and talent shows. These people are just glorified karaoke singers (so is Tim McGraw, but that is another column).

Is that really enough to be an "Idol" for America?

Apparently, yes.

These shows have become so successful that next comes that staple of American success: absolute saturation of the market.

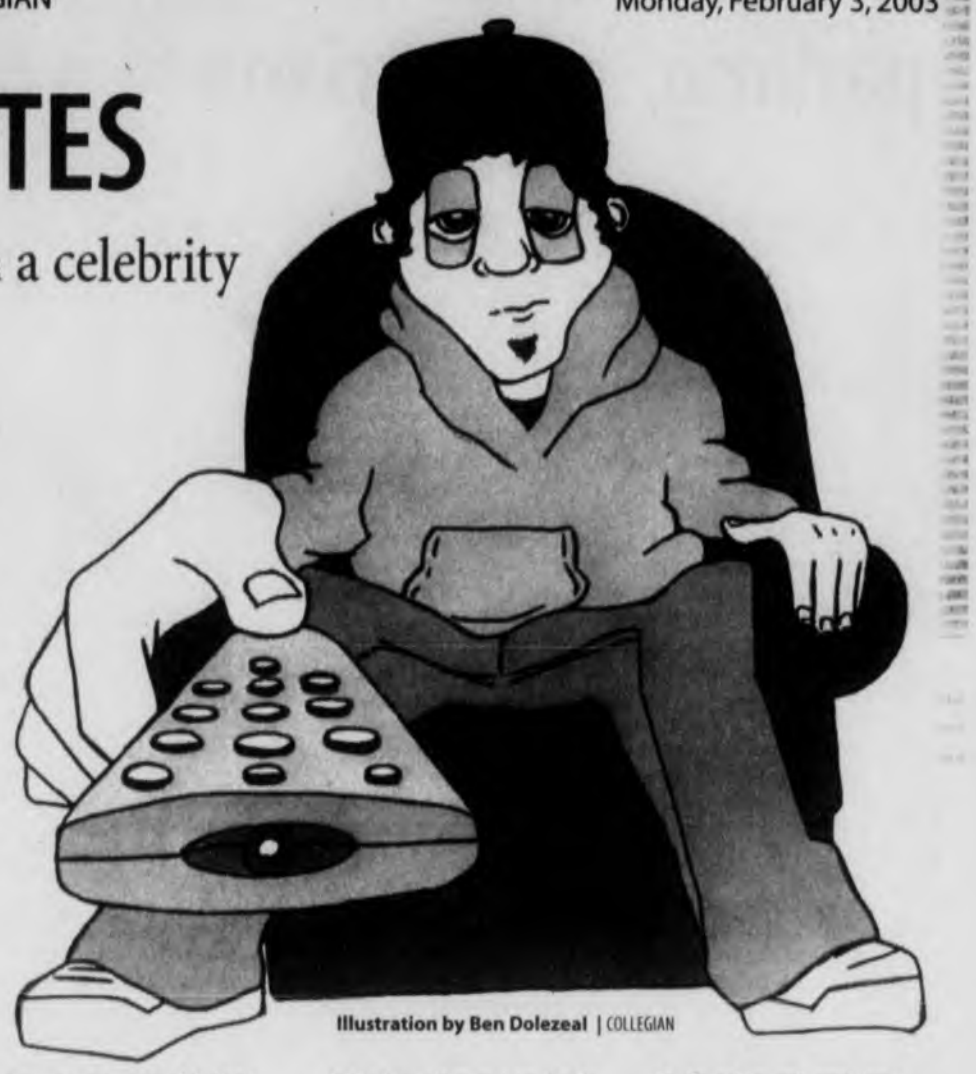

Illustration by Ben Dolezeal | COLLEGIAN

Magic Johnson's got a series, "Bachelor" 2 through 4 have to be coming along soon, and for some reason people still keep going back to that damn island on "Survivor" or wherever they go now.

What am I waiting for? Pretty soon, everyone is going to have appeared on one of these shows. That's why I have to make my move now while people are still around to watch it and not on their own shows.

What messages are these shows sending to the future generations?

Our culture enjoys watching this stuff. Why waste your time on education? It isn't that important if you want to make it famous, and what American kid doesn't want to be famous?

If you are willing to make an ass of yourself in some way, then you too can be on television.

Along with that comes increased media exposure of every tiny aspect or your previous life, the requisite 15 minutes of fame and perhaps a gig interviewing future contestants on the next season's shows. Or at least a spot on some lame "reality" show I am sure they are already creating for people who got kicked off other "reality" shows. And that is just the people who lose!

In today's economy, I'll take that.

So maybe these shows are crap and have no inherent value. How is that different from a lot of television? These shows have been around since "The Dating Game" and just continue to take it to new and worse levels.

Just don't blame them for the world's problems.

By obeying gravity's call to keep us on the couch and that show on, we allow this to continue. And also perhaps allow the chance for a guy like me to get a gig with my own bad haircut and scores of desperate ladies to choose from someday.

Besides, when I am done maybe I can parlay that into being an entertainment reporter for "Entertainment Tonight."

Legislation needed to protect farmers, crops

AIMEE NOEL

For some reason, we Americans always seem to have to have our way, no matter what. No matter where we go, no matter what we do, our headstrong nature leads us to believe we are always right and everything should conform to our standards or ways. We don't seem to care who we hurt or what is sacrificed, so long as it all works to our own selfish advantage and it's going to be our end.

Now more than ever, people are moving out of the cities and into the country.

They buy a 10-acre "farm," a horse and an SUV and all is right with their world until they discover that they've moved into a "paradise" that wasn't quite what they thought. The dust from a field, the smell of the neighbor's hog farm, the slow tractors puttering down the road are all blotches on the picture perfect postcard setting they believed the country would be.

And so, upset that it's not perfection; their car is gasp dirty, and the awful cattle down the road won't shut up during weaning season. They either piss and moan about it all and act as hostile as possible, or they take the farmer to court.

Farmers are perhaps the most underappreciated work force on the face of the planet. They slave their lives away feeding the world, make little or no money in the process and never get a thank you, only blame when food costs "too much." And now, with the suburbanite invasion, they are often forced off of their land by greedy developers or are forced to sell out when sued for outrageous sums of money.

And it seems every time a farmer is taken to court, a new law is made on how they can farm, often making it too expensive for the farmer to do his job. There are areas in the United States where farmers have to water down their fields before they plow, cultivate or plant anything.

Extremely wet soil causes mud which blocks up the equipment, making it near impossible to do anything with the ground, taking up more of the farmer's limited time to get his crop in and making his job more difficult.

Also, as farmers go out of business either from too many bad years or being forced out by developers, our nation and the world lose valuable crop land to housing.

The world's farmers are feeding an ever growing world population on ever decreasing farm ground. Luckily enough, science has provided temporary solutions to this problem, but higher-yielding crops can only grow as others do, in the correct conditions.

The drought last year left fields in Western Kansas and much of the Midwest scorched and barren, much of the potential harvest never producing even a single soybean or ear of corn. Should such trends continue, our nation could ultimately end up having to import its food.

One of the reasons our nation is so independent and strong is that we have the land available to feed ourselves. Without it, we will be dependent on other countries for food, just as we are now with oil.

So what should we do about the epidemic of farmland being swallowed by greedy developers? In my opinion, Kansas, being known for agriculture and wheat production, should take the initiative and start a trend across the nation by passing legislation to protect our crop and range land.

A farm protection plan restricting the use of farmland and a prior occupancy clause would be a very good step in the right direction.

It would state that a certain percentage of the land would be solely for agricultural use such as raising food crops or market animals.

The prior occupancy clause would state that should someone buy farmland for the sole purpose of building a house, they could not file legal action for smell, dirt, etc. that accompanies common agricultural practices as the farm was there first and they knew they were moving in next to it.

I believe this would greatly ease the burden on today's crop land and farmers as well as preserving land for Earth's future population, projected to be at a whopping 10 billion by the year 2050.

This is an important issue that involves everyone's future. It is everyone's responsibility to look out for the future of mankind. We have statutes protecting our air, our rivers, streams and oceans, why not our land?

Fair reaches out to Manhattan

Area organizations provide information to community about their services

By Mako Shores
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Organizations ranging from UFM to Mercy Regional Health Center participated in the annual community fair at the Manhattan Town Center on Saturday afternoon.

The community fair is an opportunity for clubs and organizations to get the word out about the services they provide or any volunteer work they might need.

Randy Crow, advertising and marketing director for Town Center, said it's a significant event not only to the community, but for the mall as well.

"We sponsor this event because we want to be true to ourselves," Crow said.

"We're in the center of the community and a central meeting place for Manhattan. It's the perfect place for event like this."

Some of the organizations involved this year included Riley County 4-H, Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation and Kansas Children's Service League.

KCSL promoted its program, Coming Home Kansas, during the fair.

"Coming Home Kansas is the name of KCSL's adoption and foster care family recruitment program," Angela Beims, family resource recruiter, said. "We try to provide children with foster care services in the Manhattan area."

Sunset Zoological Park also came out to the event to provide information.

"We're here to get people interested in the zoo and get them to know there is a zoo," said Karen O'Donnell, junior in wildlife biology and programs assistant for the zoo. "Being here is also a chance to bring out some animals like our hissing cockroaches and educate people on them."

Volunteers from Riley County 4-H held a raffle for prizes and provided information for its horse project.

Georgia Peck, volunteer for the project, said the fair was an opportunity to do "community outreach" in order to get more people signed up for the program.

"In the 4-H Horse Project, we cover information regarding horses like feeding, proper management and care," Peck said. "We also go over riding with the horse project members."

Crow said he believes the fair is a great opportunity for the Manhattan community.

"It's one of the things I enjoy," he said. "We've been doing this for a number of years and it's always been well received. For us it's a privilege, and it's always been a positive event and a great exchange of ideas."

Not only did the fair benefit Manhattan residents, but also people from the surrounding counties and those new to the area as well.

"Whether you're from Manhattan or not, it's a great way to plug in," Crow said. "People can learn more about the community, and for students it's a great way to become a part of the community and see how they can help."

Memorial Stadium will house new center pending budget resolutions

By Kelli Pitman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Memorial Stadium soon will be getting a facelift if some campus officials have their way.

The East and West stadiums are planned to undergo renovations as soon as funding matters are resolved by the Kansas Legislature, Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

The main focus will be the addition of a Student Welcome Center, located on the east side of the stadium.

The new center will provide a "one stop shop" for prospective and current students, Bosco said. It will house offices and services such as Student Financial Aid, Admissions, Registrar and New Student Orientation Services.

Bosco said this addition will allow all student services to be centralized, making it easier for students and their parents to get what they need when they come to campus.

"We need a place where we can welcome students to campus and meet all of their needs at a one stop shop," Bosco said.

"First impressions are very important, and this will help us do that."

According to the Memorial Stadium Renovation Building Program proposal, the cost estimate totals $4,500,000 and is projected to be completed within two years of the beginning of its construction.

He said he asked for this project to be considered 10 years ago. It has gradually worked its way up the list and is now the university's No. 1 priority, he said.

When and if the offices in Anderson Hall move to the new Welcome Center, there will be some reorganization of Anderson Hall.

No new offices will move into Anderson, but the reorganization will give current Anderson staff members more room to operate.

All of the plans for the renovations are complete, but the university must wait on the Legislature to see if funds will be allocated for the project.

The original funding proposal for the center was for $2 million from the building repairs fund and another $2 million from the City/University Tax Fund. However, Student Senate failed the proposal last fall.

The main concern is that this project will take away funds to improve other buildings and classrooms on campus, Student Body President Zac Cook said. For the next 15 years, the money will be tied up with this project and will take away needed funds for classroom repairs.

"A new Welcome Center is an amenity, not a necessity, and there are other uses that the Senate feels the money should be used for," Cook said.

Bosco said senators felt the proposal was too restrictive and would eliminate future flexibility that they had with its funds. Additionally, senators said the project should be funded by the state, he said.

"I understand their reasons, and I respect their decision," Bosco said.

Cook said he has his doubts that the proposal will gain the Legislature's support.

In these difficult financial times, legislators are not going to view this project as a priority, he said. There are other issues the state has to address, and it simply doesn't have the money to fund this project, he said.

"I think this would be good for the university, but it's not a building that makes K-State. It's the people. I don't think that prospective students are going to turn down K-State because we don't have a Welcome Center and KU does," Cook said.

Gerald Carter, director of facilities, said that, although the state is in difficult budget times, there still needs to be ideas of renovations and expansions for future campus improvements.

"This project will help students decide if they want to become a student and will help those who want to remain students," Carter said.

Women shrug history, slap OU with worst loss in 5 years

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

NORMAN, Okla. – If history was any indication, No. 3 K-State should have lost its Saturday matchup with No. 19/18 Oklahoma.

But any mention of history made Saturday was lost on the Wildcats, who shrugged off doubts about their ability to rebound from an upset loss on their way to a 74-45 blowout of the Sooners.

www.kstatecollegian.com

Check out game coverage and additional photos of No. 3 K-State's 74-45 win over No. 19/18 Oklahoma. Also, see how this year's Sooner squad compared to last season's, only at www.kstatecollegian.com.

K-State's late-season collapse a year ago encouraged those skeptics who thought OU could pull out the upset.

After an 80-76 win over then-No. 14 Texas on Jan. 30, 2002, K-State lost four of its next seven contests to end the regular season on a low note before turning in a Sweet 16 run in the NCAA Tournament.

Two of those losses came by way of unranked Missouri and then-No. 4/3 Oklahoma in Manhattan.

In Norman almost a year later, the situation had some familiar storylines.

After a 71-69 win over then-No. 17/16 Texas on Jan. 25, K-State was riding an emotional high.

Winners of 13 straight and off to the program's best start in school history, a letdown against unranked Iowa State on Wednesday seemed improbable.

Then it happened.

The Wildcats couldn't find a rhythm to their own offense and

Siebrandt helps Cats stay viable

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Matt Siebrandt isn't graceful.

In fact, his signature left-handed drives and hook shots at times look ugly.

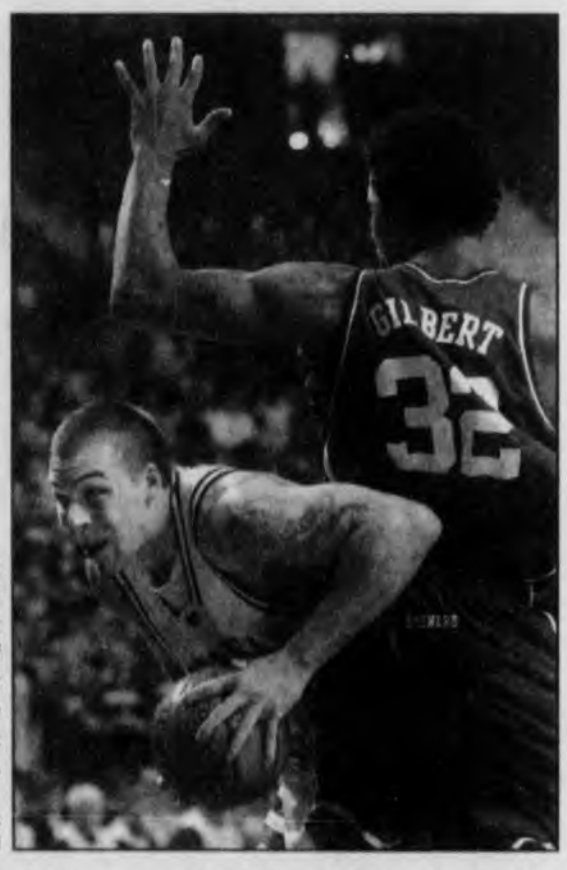
Against Oklahoma on Saturday, the Wildcat forward was twice issued a charging foul, only to have it overturned by a traveling call.

Siebrandt

But he still smelled like a rose as K-State did battle with OU.

The senior forward led K-State in points (23) and was second in rebounds (5).

"He played great," Coach Jim Wooldridge said. "He battled the low-post defense very well."



Siebrandt scored most of his points working down low on Sooner forwards Johnnie Gilbert, Jabahri Brown and Kevin Bookout. He took advantage of the trio repeatedly with the left-handed hook. The move – a Siebrandt favorite – netted the Cats 6 points.

He added four left-handed layups too – none more important than one with 49 seconds left in regulation and his team down three. Siebrandt got the ball in the low post and drove around his defender to bring K-State within one and make possible Tim Ellis' last-second, game-tying 3-pointer.

That shot, Siebrandt said, was one for the books.

"That was unbelievable," he said. "A little bit of me thought the game was over because we couldn't get a 3-point shot. It got in the right hands at the right time, and Tim knocked it down. It probably was one of the best highlights we've had since I've been here."

"It was tough. I wanted to be out there."
Matt Siebrandt

K-State's Matt Seibrandt drives the ball around Oklahoma's Johnnie Gilbert during the first half of Saturday's game at Bramlage Coliseum. The Wildcats lost 91-89 in overtime to the Sooners.

Nicole Donnert
COLLEGIAN

But before Ellis had a need to make the shot, Siebrandt played a major role in keeping the Cats in the game. He scored 12 of K-State's first 25 and did his share of damage from the foul line. He hit five of seven free throws and was fouled seven times. The fouls he drew helped bench three of Oklahoma's top scorers.

But, he also dished out his share of fouls and incurred his fifth with 3:37 left in overtime.

"He played an outstanding game," Wooldridge said. "He was frustrated with the fouls, but he played through it. He played with a lot of courage out there today."

Having to watch his teammates battle in overtime was a harsh sentence, Siebrandt said. It also was tough on the Cats. With the loss of Siebrandt in overtime, K-State was down two starters. Gilson DeJesus fouled out at the 8:57 mark in the second half.

Losing two senior leaders made the rest of the team work that much harder, Siebrandt said. It got everyone involved, whether they were starters or sitting on the bench.

"It was tough," he said. "I wanted to be out there. It was a really fun game to be involved in and play in, but it was hard to watch from the sideline. Everybody on

Next games vital for Wildcat men

When you out-hustle, out-work and surprise a team that no one gave you a chance against, it has to feel pretty good.

K-State's men's basketball team has done that a number of times this year, and yet they have come up short on nearly every occasion.

Against Colorado on Jan. 15, the Cats outshot the Buffaloes but fell short 69-63 in Boulder, Co., breaking an eight-game winning streak. But this team didn't give up.

TOM FONTANA

Three days later against then-No. 12 Kansas, K-State spotted the Jayhawks a 15-0 lead but fought back to within eight points, only to falter down the stretch and lose 81-64. But everyone saw how this team could play that night in Allen Fieldhouse.

Next, a disappointing loss to Oklahoma on Saturday. The back-and-forth battle went down to the wire in regulation and was a nail-biter until the final buzzer in overtime, with the Cats losing 91-89.

The Cats fought hard throughout the contest but just fell short – just short.

In one of the ugliest sequences I've ever seen, K-State junior Tim Ellis hit a three-pointer with 0.1 seconds left.

Down two in overtime, junior Frank Richards had to intentionally miss his free throw in hopes of catching a break on the rebound. The ball found its way into Jarrett Hart's hand on the left side of the lane. Hart threw up a left-handed shot that went long and the game was over.

Now, K-State just needs a win in exchange for its hard work. That's the next step.

But it's going to be a giant step, as K-State travels on Wednesday to Stillwater to meet Oklahoma State. Then come the mighty, mighty Jayhawks on Saturday.

Going on the road has been a little tricky for the Cats. K-State has just two wins on the road if you count the Cats' win over Michigan at the Paradise Jam on Nov. 25. K-State hasn't won a K-State's tennis team kicked off an up-and-down Saturday for the Wildcats this weekend.

No. 53 K-State won five of six singles matches from Southwest Missouri State and won the doubles point to improve to 2-0 on the year with a 6-1 win over the Lady Bears on Saturday at Ahearn Field House.

Senior Petra Sedlmajerova (2-0), named Thursday to the 2003 Preseason Coaches' All-Big 12 team, made quick work of the Lady Bears' Ia Zozrashvili with a 6-1, 6-0 win at No. 1 singles.

The Wildcats stayed undefeated at No. 2 and No. 3 singles as well, with wins by sophomore Maria Rosenberg (2-0) and freshman Jessica Simosa (2-0), respectively.

Paulina Castillejos dropped to 0-2 as the Cats' No. 4 after losing to SMSU's Maria Amato 7-5, 6-2 in the Lady Bears' only singles win.

K-State picked up the doubles point on wins by Sedlmajerova and Castillejos (2-0) at No. 2 and Hayley McIver and Rosenberg (1-1) at No. 3.

Men's basketball

Later that afternoon, Tim Ellis' last-second 3-pointer sent the game to overtime, but K-State's men still lost to No. 6 Oklahoma 91-89 at Bramlage Coliseum.

It was the Wildcats' (11-8, 2-4) first home conference loss since losing to Kansas on Feb. 4, 2002.

Down five in the extra frame, junior Frank Richards drew the foul while sinking a layup that cut the lead to two with 4.9 seconds left.

After Richards missed the charity intentionally, Junior Jarrett Hart grabbed the rebound and missed a two-foot put-back opportunity to add another overtime.

OU's Ebi Ere led all scorers with 25 points and hauled in a team-high eight rebounds for the Sooners. Senior Matt Siebrandt had 22 for K-State, which lost for the fourth time in five games.

"It hurt pretty bad. That's one we should get," Ellis said. "We were so close but then we ended up short. Now we have

EFFICIENT EATING

Planning meals ahead, eating at home help students save money, stay healthier

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College is a time in life where health tends to be sacrificed in the name of convenience and frugality.

Alyssa Campbell, sophomore in biology and a resident of Boyd Hall, said she uses the dining services twenty-meal plan, but lives on snacks like chips and popcorn.

"It's kind of hard to find healthy choices in the dining center unless you just want sandwiches," she said.

Campbell said she does try to eat healthily by eating fruits and vegetables though.

Sandy Procter, extension coordinator of the Expanded Food and Nutrition Program, said there are several snacks that are both healthy and cost – efficient.

"String cheese is a really good source of calcium and protein," she said. "Graham crackers with peanut butter carry well, and the whole grain and nuts are good for us.

"There are lots of dried fruits out there other than raisins. Cranberries and apricots have a nice texture and sweetness. Having this stuff on hand would stop people from feeling like they need a candy bar."

Procter said one of the best ways to save money is by efficient storage.

"Don't invest just in groceries, but things like zip-type baggies and containers for leftovers so it stays good," she said.

Generic food is a good way to save money without sacrificing nutritional value, Procter said.

"They're a good buy," she said. "A lot of the time there is no noticeable difference. If I'm paying a lot of money for a name brand, it won't be appreciably better."

While they may not be the healthiest options in town, there are plenty of economical choices for students who want to eat out.

Taco Hut sells hard tacos for $.69 and soft tacos for $.95. Carin Elwell, Taco Hut assistant manager, said other good deals are sanchos and burritos, which each sell for $2.10.

"Tacos are probably what most college students order, but all of our food is pretty reasonable," Elwell said.

Robert Baker, consumer credit counselor in Lawrence, said managing credit is an important way to budget for food.

"If you pay a $10 pizza with your credit card, it could wind up costing you $50 after a few months of compounding interest," Baker said.

"The Bureau of Labor Statistics put out a report saying the average person spends $100 a month on groceries and eating out. If you're eating out everyday, it's going to be a lot more."

Baker said there are dangers when using credit.

"You go out to eat and have a $10 meal but you don't have money, so you charge it against your account. You are going to receive a $30 insufficient funds charge, so the $10 meal winds up being actually $40," Baker said.

"That's why it's really important if you want to do that fun stuff, you have to have the money in your account."

UPC works to sponsor dinner theater performance in Union

Comedy 'A Gentleman and a Scoundrel' to be performed at K-State by Repertory Theatre of America

By Scot Gammill
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thursday evening the Union Program Council will be presenting a dinner theater that will feature the play "A Gentleman and a Scoundrel."

The comedy is about an office worker who gets permission from his employer to hire an assistant for himself. Always finding himself short of money, he has the great idea to hire himself so he will receive two paychecks instead of one. Then a women starts to like the assistant and he pretends to be rich to try and impress her.

"It is a really great lighthearted comedy," said Kelly Ernst, UPC traditions committee chair. "It is almost like a 'Joe Millionaire' kind of situation."

The actors for this presentation are from the Repertory Theatre of America in Baltimore, Md.

The company has been touring across the United States and Canada since 1967. It has given about 15,000 performances for organizations like colleges, universities and country clubs. The group specializes in interactive murder mysteries and dinner theater comedies, according to the Repertory Theatre of America Web site.

"There was a special reason why we chose this particular play," Ernst said. "Since it is getting very close to Valentine's Day we thought this would fit very well."

This is the first time in many years that UPC has sponsored a dinner theatre.

"Hopefully this production will go well and we will have another dinner theater after this one," Ernst said.

To ensure the evening runs smoothly, Ernst is focusing on ways to make the night enjoyable for everyone.

"We have been working with the chef at the Union in preparation for the dinner theater," she said. "The meal should be very good."

The Meal

- Appetizer: apricot salad
- Main course: boursin stuffed chicken breast, parmesan peppercorn potatoes, sauteed green beans
- Dessert: chocolate cake with white chocolate sauce

Where: Union Ballroom
When: 6:30 p.m. Thursday
Cost: $10 for students, $13 for general public. Today is the last day to buy tickets. You can buy them at the UPC office in the K-State Student Union or call 532-6571.

Deficiency looms for Wichita Symphony Orchestra

The Wichita Symphony Orchestra anticipates ending the season with a deficit — the first time in more than two decades.

General manager Mitchell Berman said he expects to finish the season with a deficit of about $100,000. This year's operating budget for the symphony, which had recorded surpluses for 22 years, is $2.1 million.

Those little Hot Wheels cars are cruising to a theater near you.

Sony's Columbia Pictures has optioned the rights to make a movie based on Hot Wheels, Mattel's line of sleek toy cars, the studio and toy maker said Thursday.

"Hot Wheels" will be directed by McG, the filmmaker behind "Charlie's Angels" and its sequel that is due in theaters in June. The studio has not yet selected a screenwriter for "Hot Wheels," and no shooting date has been set.

Clerical error lands Streep in wrong category for SAG awards

A studio mistake left Meryl Streep competing against herself for the Screen Actors Guild awards, possibly costing her one if not two nominations.

A Sony spokesman said a studio employee incorrectly submitted Streep's name in the lead-actress category for "Adaptation." The studio considers it a supporting-actress role and has been pushing Streep in that category for other film awards.

The mistake may have split Streep's votes between "Adaptation" and her other contending role for "The Hours," which Paramount also submitted in the lead-actress category.

HISTORY | Cats look to game against Missouri after win over OU

struggled to solve for the Cyclones on the other end, as Iowa State recorded the program's biggest upset with a 74-69 win in Ames.

The next challenge came against an injury-riddled Sooner team resolved to make a statement.

"This is not an easy place to play, and you know when you line up against Oklahoma, you're lining up against a team that's really going to come after you, be aggressive, be very confident and very well-coached," Coach Deb Patterson said.

The Sooners' approach was manageable, though, as K-State beat OU for the first time in six tries to stay in the hunt for the Big 12 lead, a half-game behind conference co-leaders Texas and Texas Tech.

Any pressure heaped on the Wildcats' shoulders after their poor showing against the Cyclones was gone by the tip.

"Wednesday was a tough day, and we knew we didn't come out and play our best," sophomore Kendra Wecker said, following her 24-point afternoon against the Sooners. "We had a couple of really good days of practice after that, and we came down here to OU ready to play. We were aggressive in all aspects of our game tonight."

Aggressive enough to hold the Sooners to 31-percent shooting, including a 6-of-27 first half.

Effective enough to scorch the nets for a 61-percent second-half shooting sizzle of their own.

And opportunistic enough to book 26 points off 16 Oklahoma turnovers.

"We began to find some solutions within the framework of how we like to play," Patterson said of her team's effort without Laurie Koehn, out due to an ankle/foot injury.

"A lot of it depends on individual players stepping up and answering the matchup challenges they face one-on-one. Tonight was progress to that extent."

Unranked Missouri comes next for the Cats, and any questions regarding K-State's level of preparedness for the rest of the league schedule were answered Saturday by sophomore Megan Mahoney.

"We don't have any doubts," she said.

"We know what we're capable of, and we were just hungry to get back on the floor and try to battle for a win."

this team – one through 12 – everybody fought hard and gave it their all today."

No matter who won the game, Siebrandt said it was a great one.

He said the way the crowd got into it and wouldn't let the team quit was amazing.

But leading his team in scoring and coming within an errant two-foot put-back of beating the country's No. 6 team wasn't enough to please Siebrandt.

He said the Cats need to forget about the chances they had and focus on playing at Oklahoma State on Wednesday night.

"It was back-and-forth, back-and-forth, and the crowd was great. It was a great team effort and just a great college atmosphere," he said.

"We've got more games and we can't worry about this one. As long as we keep fighting like this, things will work out. This team just has to move on. There are plenty of games left."

road conference game in 11 tries.

If there was ever a time to win on the road, it's now. After a terrible effort at Texas A&M and a heartbreaking loss against Oklahoma, this team needs a solid win.

K-State has the power to beat anyone in this league with Matt Siebrandt and Pervis Pasco on the inside, two of the best 3-point shooters in the Big 12 in Gilson DeJesus and Tim Ellis on the wings and point guard Frank Richards, who is among the league's top five in assists.

The starters all average over nine points per game, and Jarett Hart and Marques Hayden both come off the bench to provide over seven per contest.

I've got to believe KU coach Roy Williams would love to have one player come off his bench to average seven points a game, let alone two. His bench players, all seven of them, give him a combined 11.8 a game.

K-State must forget some things if it is to be successful in two areas it hasn't been in a long time.

First, road games. Forget about the conference road losing streak. Don't think about it.

To be successful in this league, you have to win on the road. The team that took Oklahoma to the wire Saturday is not the team that has shown up on the road.

Second, the horrific streak against Kansas. No wins since 1994 and never in Bramlage Coliseum. This is nearly impossible to erase from anyone's mind, considering the massacres that have taken place since Bramlage was built in 1988.

Forgetting is easier said than done, but to play as well as the Cats did against Oklahoma in the two upcoming games, bad memories must be forgotten.

This university is craving a successful men's team, and it has been seven years since it last appeared in the NCAA Tournament.

The 2002-2003 Wildcats are on the doorstep.

All they have to do is knock down that huge crimson and blue door. One big win could get K-State over the hump.

to go back to practice, bounce back and look forward to the next game."

Women's basketball

Kendra Wecker had a game-high 24 points, Megan Mahoney pitched in 15 and Nicole Ohlde added 12 as No. 3 K-State handed No. 19/18 Oklahoma its worst lost in five years 74-45 Saturday afternoon in Norman, Okla.

Freshman guard Chelsi Welch led Oklahoma with 12 points.

"We came out and really started aggressive and maintained that," Ohlde said. "We wanted to control what we were capable of controlling. When we got the rebound and outlet, we wanted to get up the court and get into positions on the court to start our offense."

The Wildcats netted 26 points off 16 Sooner turnovers and executed well on offense against OU's injury-riddled lineup. K-State's defense did the rest, keeping the Sooners out of system to the tune of a 31-percent shooting performance while leading by as many as 32.

"It was a big win for us," Coach Deb Patterson said, "because it was a game coming off a loss, and our second consecutive road game, and a team that we have so much respect for and a program we hold in such high esteem."

MOURNING | Authorities examine tragedy cause

ascent that ultimately doomed the shuttle.

A special federal commission also will conduct an investigation, with its emphasis on policy matters affecting the future of the U.S. space program. Harold W. Gehman Jr., the retired Navy admiral who helped lead the Pentagon's inquiry into the USS Cole bombing, will head that commission.

Committees in the House and Senate also plan to examine the disaster.

"The key issue for us in Congress is why did it happen, how did it happen, how do we fix it and then how do we project on forward with manned space flight?" said Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan. "We need to continue that for the vision of the country and the vision of the world."

Across hundreds of square miles of Texas and Louisiana, civilian and military authorities used horses, four-wheel drive vehicles, Army helicopters and satellite data to locate shuttle debris in pastures, woods and swamps.

Human remains, including a charred torso, were found along the Texas-Louisiana state line. At a school in Douglas, Texas, 150 miles northeast of Houston, debris dented the roof and dotted the baseball field.

Kerss said it could be weeks or months before searchers reach remote areas that might hold pieces of the shuttle.

No injuries were reported due to falling debris. But Sue Kennedy, emergency management coordinator for Nacogdoches County, said 70 people went to local hospitals because they touched debris and were concerned about possible toxic contamination.

As law enforcement agencies struggled to protect the bits of wreckage, NASA warned against trying to auction purported Columbia debris on eBay.

"People should not be collecting that at all. It's all government property," said Bruce Buckingham, a NASA spokesman.

In Iraq, bracing for possible war with the United States, the government issued no formal statement about Columbia, but some officials expressed sympathy for the American people.

"We respect their feelings and share their sadness," said Bushra al-Samarai, a member of the Iraqi National Assembly.

Both the shuttle disaster and Iraq were evoked at the church service attended by President Bush.

In Houston, the entrance to the Johnson Space Center was turned into a shrine for the fallen astronauts – shuttle commander Rick Husband, Michael Anderson, David Brown, Kalpana Chawla, Laurel Clark, William McCool and Ilan Ramon.

"You're our hero," said a note for Ramon, the first Israeli in space.

Russian space officials also offered condolences.

Kansans address space shuttle disaster, loss

By Steve Brisendine
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Sen. Sam Brownback was looking ahead to his first hearing as chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Space, Science and Technology.

Now, after Saturday's loss of the space shuttle Columbia and all seven aboard, he's approaching the hearing – still scheduled for Thursday – with a sense of grim responsibility.

Sam Brownback
CHAIRMAN OF SENATE SUBCOMMITTEE ON SPACE, SCIENCE, TECHNOLOGY

"Obviously, the focus will be on this tragedy and not on what we had planned," said Brownback, R-Kan. "I was very excited about looking into the future and what we could do, but safety is the paramount issue. We've got to do what it takes to make the astronauts safe."

The news that the tragedy did not appear terror-related brought some relief, but also stunned Kansans who, as memories of the 1986 Challenger explosion receded, had stopped worrying about the safety of space travelers.

Had Columbia not been carrying the first Israeli astronaut, Ilan Ramon, its last mission would have drawn even less attention.

"It's just one more of those things that have become commonplace," said Bruce Boomer, an environmental engineer from the Kansas City suburb of Prairie Village. "I was aware of this mission because of the person from Israel, but other than that, I hadn't thought anything else about it."

Brownback agreed that 15 relatively uneventful years since shuttle flights resumed after the Challenger disaster had made the public less conscious of space flight's dangers.

"We've done so many of them successfully that people start to look at them as routine when they're not," Brownback said. "They're very difficult and dangerous. We're pressing the envelope back."

Officials placed a floral memorial at the Kansas Cosmosphere and Space Center in Hutchinson, which displays several artifacts from the Challenger disaster – and where several former employees have gone on to work for NASA.

"It's been a struggle for everyone," said Joel Walker, the center's director of education. "This is what we do. It's a sad day for NASA, for the families. For everyone who is involved in space, this is a tragedy. We're trying to figure out how we fit in and how NASA moves on."

Fans at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence observed a moment of silence before the Kansas women played Texas Tech in basketball – a moment made more poignant by the Columbia crew's ties to the visiting team.

Commander Rick Husband, 45, was an Air Force colonel from Amarillo, Texas, who attended Texas Tech. Pilot William McCool, 41, was a Navy commander who grew up in Lubbock, Texas, before going on to the U.S. Naval Academy.

K-State also paused for a moment of silence before its men's basketball game against Oklahoma.

"It's just such a shock to the nation, and I'm sure it was on the minds of everybody in this building, including the players and coaches," said Jon Wefald, K-State's president. "Any time you lose such valiant, brave Americans it breaks your heart. All we can do is go on as a nation and think optimistically about the future."

care packages throughout their service.

"It's sad it has come to this – that we have to resort to stuff like this to defend humanity," she said.

Staff Sgt. Chris McManaman has done the deployment routine before. He was activated and deployed to Bosnia in 1997 and then the Netherlands in 2000.

"I feel like I am prepared to go," he said. "This is nothing new to me. It gets easier every time."

But now, McManaman, who is earning a bachelors degree from K-State's distance learning program, has a wife in Florida that he has to leave behind.

"I was excited about the upcoming mission, but I was sad to leave my family," he said.

With all the controversy surrounding the war on terrorism, Harris assured the soldiers they were doing the right thing.

"We know there are threats," he said. "Sept. 11 changed the world we live in. Our commander in chief is about to make a decision to stop these people from making weapons of mass destruction.

"Our war is not against any civilian population, it's against their leadership. We are going to liberate people."

McManaman said the protests against military action only give him more pride in his job.

"The reason they have the right to protest is because of soldiers who defended their right to protest," he said. "That's their rights. And that's why I am here to defend them."

As Ryan Runyan's children try to understand why their father is leaving, he has words of reassurance.

"I'll be back as soon as I can," he said.

INVESTIGATION | NASA continues to gather data

to the shuttle's left wing during liftoff Jan. 16 that ultimately doomed the flight 16 days later.

Across Texas and Louisiana, meanwhile, officials were marking the exact satellite measures of the locations where debris was found in hopes it would help reconstruct the accident.

Dittemore said NASA engineers are still trying to recover 32 seconds worth of additional data from the flight computers. But he said the combination of new engineering data and an observer who reported seeing debris from the shuttle while it was still passing over California could create "a path that may lead us to the cause."

The shuttle broke up shortly before landing Saturday, killing all seven astronauts.

Earlier Sunday, NASA administrator Sean O'Keefe named a former Navy admiral to oversee an independent review of the accident, and said investigators initially would focus on whether the piece of insulation caused the damage that brought down the shuttle.

"It's one of the areas we're looking at first, early, to make sure that the investigative team is concentrating on that theory," O'Keefe said.

The manufacturer of the fuel tank disclosed Sunday that NASA used an older version of the tank, which the space agency began phasing out in 2000. NASA's preflight press information stated the shuttle was using one of the newer super-lightweight fuel tanks.

Harry Wadsworth, a spokesman for Lockheed, the tank maker, said most shuttle launches use the "super-lightweight" tank and the older version is no longer made.

Wadsworth said he did not know if there was a difference in how insulation was installed on the two types of tanks.

O'Keefe emphasized that the space agency was being careful not to lock onto any one theory too soon.

Picking Up The Pieces In America's Heartland

Former NASA employee, alumnus reflects on tragedy

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He knows what it feels like.

Duke Reiber was a witness to the 1986 Challenger explosion when he worked at NASA, and after watching the space shuttle Columbia disintegrate in flames over Texas on Saturday, he knew what was going through the minds of NASA officials.

"When something goes wrong, everyone feels it," Reiber, a 1969 K-State graduate, said. "It's very personal and painful. Everyone says, 'my God, what did we do wrong, what did we miss?'"

But Reiber said he doubts there was much NASA could have done to prevent the Columbia tragedy.

"I think everything that could be done had been done," he said. "Columbia is a space shuttle that very recently was significantly refurbished. There was some comment made that it was one of the older shuttles, but it did not have the flight experience that the others had. It has been overhauled, renovated and inspected. I am pretty sure the vehicle itself was safe."

With his experiences working for five years at NASA Headquarters, Reiber knows the high regard for safety that goes into every shuttle mission.

"You wouldn't believe how much effort goes into that," he said. "They try to understand what every failure mode would be. They try to develop systems that will tolerate as much as possible or can provide contingency solutions to make it safer or provide opportunity for survival.

"In many cases, there is simply nothing that Can be done."

Flying in a space shuttle assumes some risk, Reiber said, but astronauts don't live in fear.

COLUMBIA TRAGEDY

Recent K-State graduate experiences Columbia tragedy

Steven Dearinger, a 2001 K-State alumnus and former Collegian photographer, is now working at the Amarillo Globe-News in Amarillo, Texas. He was given the assignment of photographing debris in northern Texas after the space shuttle Columbia disintegrated in flames Saturday, minutes before it was scheduled to land in Florida.

1. What happened when you found out the space shuttle Columbia disintegrated?
"Saturday, around noon, they told me I was going to be on a flight down there. We landed in Dallas at 2:30 p.m. and went to Palestine, Texas, an hour away from Nacogdoches. We followed the stories and photos from there. We drove Sunday morning to Nacogdoches."

2. What shuttle debris did you see?
"We saw a lot of little pieces here and there. The biggest piece was a ball, believed to be a fuel tank. It was 3-ft. in diameter.
"Around Palestine, they were guarding pieces heavily, 24 hours a day. In Nacogdoches, they were guarding important pieces. It was marked with a flag or police had it separated from everything else."

3. How were the people in these communities responding?
"Most were shocked and surprised that this fell in their backyard. Each person had their story of how they heard it and where they were. Some people described it as a train going by and some people described it as an earthquake. One lady said it was like 20 people were stomping on her roof."

4. How has this story touched you personally?
"It's always interesting to see how people react to natural tragedies in their area. The communities seem to be coming together to do what was needed to do to preserve the pieces. They were mostly reporting them and trying to do the right thing."

RCPD targets impatient drivers for traffic safety as part of new program

Riley County to begin ticketing drivers who follow others closely

By Kelli Pitman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department has recently implemented another program to increase driver safety on the roads in and around the Manhattan area.

As part of the Traffic Accident Reduction Program, TARP, officers will now issue citations for cars that are following too closely to the car in front of them.

RCPD Sgt. Steve Boyda said there will be three selective enforcement locations each month. Officers on duty in those areas will specifically watch for cars following too closely.

For the month of February the locations will be the between the 300 and 3600 blocks of Anderson Avenue and Bluemont Avenue, the 1800 and 2900 blocks of Claflin Road, and Kansas Highway 18 between Ogden and Manhattan.

"These locations were chosen because of the number of accidents, complaints and number of violations that have occurred in these areas in the past," Boyda said.

Three different locations will be chosen each month

Bush presents $2.23 trillion budget with record deficits

By Alan Fram
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – President Bush shipped lawmakers a $2.23 trillion budget for 2004 on Monday bearing record deficits and seeking deep new tax cuts, an ambitious expansion of Medicare and bolstering security at home and abroad at the expense of domestic programs.

George W. Bush
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Though Republican majorities in Congress mean Bush's plans will get a better reception than last year's did when Democrats ran the Senate, some elements will clearly be reshaped, like his call for a fresh 10-year, $1.3 trillion tax cut.

Whatever happens, the proposal sets the stage for a partisan battle over fiscal priorities likely to rumble right into next year's White House and congressional elections.

Democrats said the budget would deepen government debt just as it should be shoring up Social Security and Medicare for the approaching retirement of the 76 million-strong baby boom generation.

"Buried in President Bush's budget is a plan to dismantle Social Security and Medicare," said Rep. Charles Rangel of New York, the House Ways and Mean's Committee's top Democrat.

"By demanding large tax cuts again even though there are no longer surpluses, the administration will starve the government of funds."

The president said his plan focused on the most important challenges facing the United States.

"A recession and a war we did not choose have led to the return of deficits," Bush said in a message accompanying the five-volume, 13.5-pound blueprint.

"My administration firmly believes in controlling the deficit and reducing it as the economy strengthens and our national security interests are met."

One item sure to get special attention on Capitol Hill was Bush's proposal to give NASA a modest 3 percent increase to $15.5 billion in the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

NASA doesn't think the thermal tiles were reason for worry
NASA acknowledged Monday that officials may have gotten it wrong when they concluded in a report four days before Columbia disintegrated that a flying, 2 1/2-pound chunk of insulation did no serious damage to the shuttle's thermal tiles during liftoff. NASA officials said they will start their analysis from scratch.

Pentagon thinking of bolstering troops as signal to North Korea
The Pentagon is considering new deployments in the Pacific Ocean to signal North Korea that the United States remains capable of blunting an attack in Korea despite its focus on possible war in Iraq, officials said Monday. No decision has been made, but Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld is considering options including sending an aircraft carrier to the waters off the Korean peninsula.

Man convicted of shooting horseshoe player in stomach

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

If you ever run into these people, here's what to do:

(1) If you're playing horseshoes with Fred William Leigh, and he says it's a ringer, it's a ringer (The insistent Leigh, 60, was convicted of shooting his disagreeing opponent in the stomach with a .38; Frederick, Md., December).

(2) Don't demand fresh bacon with your eggs from Steven Deere, 50, when the rest of his family is having leftover pork (Deere was charged with shooting his stepson with a 9 mm pistol; Pittsburgh, December).

(3) Don't insult Amanda Hicks' baby (The 20-year-old and two girlfriends allegedly punched, kicked, kneed, stripped and burned the man, and raped him with two different objects; Panama City, Fla., December).

Lead Stories

Following a religious experience, Michael Braithwaite of the mountain village of Putney, Ky., recently converted his Love World shop, selling vibrators and other porn paraphernalia, to Mike's Place, selling Bibles and other Christian items.

However, according to a December report in the San Francisco Bay Guardian, a 31-year-old government lawyer has developed a side business that may bridge both of Braithwaite's lines: The lawyer manufactures and sells high-quality, silicone sex toys in the shapes of religious icons, such as Moses, Satan and a nun, at prices of $54 to $65 each. One sex shop owner in San Francisco's freewheeling Castro district said he might stock the "Jackhammer Jesus" model, but that his Buddhist customers would be offended at the Buddha model.

Readers' Choice

Edward Blaine, 61, who served 20 years in prison for a 1963 bank robbery, apparently is becoming even less competent with age, as he was arrested in January and charged with robbing the Union Bank & Trust branch in Port Royal, Va. Police said Blaine fled with the stash while $100 bills were falling out of his pockets, and then he realized as he arrived at his car that he had locked the keys inside.

He grabbed a log to smash the window but tossed it away only to have it hit Emmett Lowe's truck, thus angering Lowe, who grabbed a gun and chased Blaine for 150 yards. In a struggle, Blaine shot at Lowe but hit himself in the leg, just before Lowe shot Blaine in the same leg.

Compelling Explanations

A judge at London's Old Bailey released 31-time recidivist Mark Patterson after his 32nd conviction, for burglary, because Patterson claimed that he needed drug rehabilitation so he could become a poet. (His subsequent ode to the judge, in part: "I've now been set free / in a blaze of publicity / so that everyone can see / my great ability.")

Ayub Ali Khan, 36, who was held in a Brooklyn, N.Y., jail for 13 months after being detained as suspicious in the aftermath of Sept. 11, told a Washington Post reporter in January, "I feel I am the real victim of (Sept. 11). Just look at how much my family and I suffered." Khan was deported to Hyderabad, India, after pleading guilty to credit card fraud (using and selling fake credit cards and other bogus documents).

Richard Hobbs, who solicits tips in public by making balloon sculptures for children, filed a lawsuit against Westchester County, N.Y., for denying him the right to work the crowd at the county's Playland Amusement Park.

In the course of defending the lawsuit, the county discovered that Hobbs had been convicted in 1978 and 1982 of sexual abuse of children.

However, Hobbs persisted with the lawsuit, and in December, federal judge John Martin ordered the two parties to settle among themselves the issue of which areas of the park are commercial and which are traditional park space, in that Hobbs apparently has a constitutional right to practice his craft in traditional park spaces.

Odd Court Findings

A judge in Monroe County, N.Y., denied Jerold Ponder's application for a handgun permit, but Ponder is appealing that decision, even though he is currently in jail charged with the shooting death of his pregnant girlfriend.

Ponder's best-case-scenario defense is that it was just an accident, occurring while he and the girlfriend were target-shooting with a rifle, and that the incident is not relevant to whether he is safety-conscious enough to carry a pistol.

According to the prosecutor at the Waterloo, Iowa, not only did Bradley Steven Bailey steal a day's bank deposit for the Hardee's restaurant where he worked, but after he was arrested and jailed, he wrote a letter to the Hardee's manager saying he was sorry but that he never did get his final paycheck, and could it please be mailed to him.

Matt Elliott | COLLEGIAN

Theme to represent black history

By Mako Shores
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some say a theme can say it all.

"The Souls of Black Folk: Centennial Reflections" is the national theme this February for Black History Month.

The theme idea came from a 1903 book by William E.B. DuBois called, "The Souls of Black Folk."

"It's a great theme," Brandon Franklin, junior in communications, said.

"It sounds very well thought out, and I think it fits the meaning of the month."

Not until 1926 was black history recognized annually in the United States.

Negro History Week, which was the initial concept to honor black history, was the idea of Carter G. Woodson, a black author and scholar.

Woodson also founded the Association for the Study of Afro-American Life and History in 1915 in an effort to support the accurate and proper study of African-Americans.

Black students have strong feelings about Black History Month and say it has great meaning to their cultural background.

"Black History Month symbolizes the progression of how far we've come in 400 years," Eugene Hill, senior in physical therapy, said.

"It's a symbol of pride. For so long we didn't have anything. It's great to have a month we can have dedicated to our culture."

Another student also said the month has significant meaning to her.

"It's important to me that we have a month set aside to learn about black history," Jennifer Austin, junior in kinesiology, said.

"I think it's a good idea, and it's an opportunity for other races and African-Americans to understand the black culture."

Woodson's goal of Negro History Week was the hope that Americans would explore their ethnic backgrounds, and racial groups in the United States would come together out of a common respect for each other.

Allen Reese, senior in communications, agreed with Woodson's view and said courses dealing with a variety of ethnicities and backgrounds should be considered for everyone.

"Classes about different cultures should be required because everyone should know about all cultures," Reese said.

"If everyone did that, they would have an understanding about all cultures, and there wouldn't be all these stereotypes and hate towards others."

Additionally, there are students who say black history has not been fairly represented throughout time.

"African-Americans don't get the respect they deserve in society, let alone in history books," Hill said.

"General classes in American history spend minimal time on what African-Americans did for this country."

Tameka Campbell, sophomore in business, agreed.

"In regular history classes, they'll tell you about some things that happened involving African-Americans, but not everything that's important," she said.

"Unless you get into a class that's specifically about black history, you don't learn enough about it."

February is a month dedicated to providing Americans information needed to form a better understanding about African-Americans, according to ASALH.

Though some say black history has not gained the equal treatment in books, Austin said Black History Month is a great way to disseminate information about the culture.

"I think Black History Month is a great idea," she said.

"This month allows other people to learn about my people's history for at least 28 days, and it's nice to know they have a chance to learn about my culture."

Woodson purposely made Negro History Week a period in February that celebrates the birthdays of Frederick Douglass and Abraham Lincoln.

ASALH decided to change from a weeklong celebration to an entire month in order to provide more time for programs, observances and celebrations.

Requests were made to keep the observance a month long in order to offer more time for black history programs.

"I look forward to the programs," Franklin said.

"I think the university does a fairly well job of covering black history during the month. Then again, I am an optimist, and I think there could always be more taught about African-Americans."

Regents approve new veterinary medicine graduate program

New program to emphasize additional public health education next spring

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will soon offer a master's of public health program, thanks to recent approval by the Kansas Board of Regents.

The program, projected to begin sometime next spring, will be the first of its kind to offer public health education with veterinary medicine.

Denis Medeiros, human nutrition department head, said the master's program is the hottest degree around.

"It's the degree of choice of the future for nutrition majors at the graduate level," he said. "There is an increased need in general professionals trained in the overall area of public health care."

The new master's program will include course work in basic public health and an area of specialization in one of the four emphases of nutrition, physical activity, food safety and infectious disease control.

Students enrolled in the inter-departmental program may complete 36 hours in human nutrition, kinesiology, animal science and industry and veterinary medicine.

For Ginny Barnard, the new program has been a long time coming.

"When I graduated, they were talking about a master's in public health," she said. "Ever since then, I've been working on my research here and waiting to see if they would get a master's program put together."

Barnard has been working as a research assistant in the Department of Human Nutrition since graduating in summer 2001 in public health nutrition and gerontology. Barnard said she stayed at K-State in hopes of the new master's program.

"It's a great addition to our department," she said. "I'm glad I've been patient and waited."

Dr. M. Chengappa, department head of diagnostic medicine and pathobiology, said the master's program isn't just for nutrition majors.

"It's an excellent opportunity for people who are interested in public health in general," he said. "In this age of bioterrorism, disease and food safety, K-State offers a unique opportunity to train individuals in this area of growing demand."

Curtis Kastner, director of the Food Science Institute, said students in public health are in great demand.

"There's a lot of concern about issues that impact public health, like lifestyle and food safety," he said. "We see the master's degree in public health as being a very good complement to what we already do and what we're involved in, relative to food safety and food science."

Kastner said the program offers something for everyone.

"A student in public health can take a course in toxicology alongside a vet student or a food science student," he said.

Medeiros said a student in the master's program can get a job in a hot area.

"They can work for the CDC, FDA, biosecurity measures or public health departments," he said. "Also, opportunities are available in health care institutions and health care agencies."

Medeiros said the program will meet a demand unavailable in current programs.

"The master's in public health is rapidly becoming the MBA of health care," he said. "If I had to do it over again, I'd get a master's in public health."

TO THE POINT

Bush's budget proposal looks problematic

The $2.23 trillion budget proposal submitted by President Bush on Monday is a woefully unbalanced plan that fails to recognize the burgeoning economic problems the United States has been dealt.

The largest problem in the troubling proposal is the record $307 billion deficit the U.S. economy will face for fiscal year 2004, significantly more than the $290 billion record incurred under George H.W. Bush's administration.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

These numbers are in stark contrast to the budget projections issued by the Kaiser Commission following Bush's 2001 budget proposal. The current recession has dropped federal budget projections more than $500 billion.

This drop in deficit spending is not flawed in only one area of Bush's proposed budget. The president's emphasis on renewed tax cuts, increased military and security spending and cuts in areas competing for federal money in an already tight budget environment will jeopardize the economy.

Despite having already proposed and passed significant tax cuts across the board for years to come, Bush's plan presents a new $1.3 trillion cut spread across the next decade. This is coupled with Bush's proposal to discontinue taxing dividends on stock returns at the federal level.

Bush's earlier tax cuts have proven to be ineffective, even for short term economic cycles. Bringing in federal revenue will become much more difficult for starving programs like Medicare and Social Security when larger portions of the population will be reaching retirement age.

Following last year's 11 percent boost in the military budget, spending for the Pentagon and Department of Homeland Defense will continue to grow if not checked by Congress. Also, no provisions have been made in Bush's budget projections for the possibility of war with Iraq.

Ultimately, these increases in spending will limit other important federal programs. Bush continues to sacrifice the future of programs unrelated to war and big business so that his administration can proclaim their conservative economics in the next election cycle.

He's A Wanksta

Columnist attempts to discover his black self

PAUL RESTIVO

I have always wanted to get in touch with my black urban self.

Little did I know how little I know about the black urban culture. This past weekend, I sat down with a few of my Kansas City peeps (I already knew that term) and compiled more words and phrases for my internal urban glossary, which up until then had only consisted of ever-popular words like "yo," "wassup," "chillin'" and "dog."

Among the newest of my words is "wanksta" – which I was called immediately upon my arrival. I thought I looked alright in my FUBU coat, Enyce shirt, Fat Albert jeans, my do-rag and Air Force Ones. But my 130-pound frame got lost somewhere in one of my FUBU sleeves.

This led them to label me as a "wanksta" – a wannabe gangsta. I could qualify for gangsta status if I "popped" someone. I have no interest. Lucky for me, we were all wankstas. I was just the only one "out of my wanksta closet."

My peeps and I then went to pick up my "boo," which is different than my "mommy." A "mommy," said the peeps, is someone I would be trying to get with, while my "boo" is my current girlfriend.

Yeah, I know. These words – like my column – are kind of "bootsy" (something that is not cool).

Eventually, my peeps didn't want me around because I didn't flaunt my "bling-bling" – my jewelry. Or at least, I didn't have platinum on. I thought the gold crucifix was a nice touch. Guess not. I just didn't have enough "cheddar" to be "flossin'" golds on my "grill." Or, in other words, I didn't have enough money to be wearing gold caps on my teeth.

After I tried to defend my fashion woes, my peeps began to "put me on front street" – or call me out for getting into their business.

"I am?" I asked.

"Fo' shizzle," my peep said. After realizing that "fo' shizzle" was not the name of a Jewish person, they explained that it just meant "for sure."

I tried to ignore my peeps by changing the subject.

"Hey, guys. These tunes on my boombox be rockin'. Turn it up!"

"Damn, dude. You so faulty," quipped my peep.

Apparently, I was supposed to say "bump that" when wanting the volume increased.

By now, I was not the most popular wanksta in the hood – if you consider "the hood" Crayola Cafe at Crown Center.

I was dropped off at my crib shortly thereafter.

"Peep ya later. I'm gonna go home and eat it like a vulture," peep said.

I understood "peep ya later." I'm still working on eating it like a vulture. Whatever it is, I probably wouldn't mind doing it.

I learned so much in Kansas City that I just couldn't wait to share it. I have such a refined appreciation for my black brothers, and I hope that they realize my eyes are opened to more than one race's culture.

Slowly, but surely, I will assimilate these words into my language. Any more words that you might want to share with me are welcome.

Peace. I'm out like a wanksta.

Rape victims need to know facts, report perpetrators

You wore your sexiest outfit, you went into his dorm room after a date, he says you led him on. So what? You said no.

Or you woke up at your friend's sorority house after a wild party; you don't feel right, your shirt is stretched and your pants are at your ankles. You're too drunk to remember what happened at last night's affairs – you're not to blame.

LINDSEY PRAECHTER

You don't have to verbally indicate refusal, according to K-State's policy prohibiting sexual violence, for such an act to be considered rape. "An act is forced if the victim refuses, or when the victim does not verbally or otherwise indicate refusal but is incapable of refusing because of the effects of alcohol, narcotics, drugs or any other substances."

If this crime occurs at a university event or on campus, it is reviewed under the full policy prohibiting sexual violence, which can be found at www.ksu.edu/studentlife/SexPolicy. If the person charged is found to be in violation of the policy, sanctions are severe as suspension or dismissal from the university.

The K-State Women's Center's "Facts about Date Rape" fact sheet states that one in four college women are victims of rape or attempted rape. Only one in 10 rapes are said to be reported in the United States (FBI, 1991).

Women and men at K-State need to pull together to protect each other from this horrendous and devastating crime on and off campus.

Since it is largely an acquaintance crime, trusting anyone is difficult. Eighty-four percent of college rape victims know their attackers, and rape is the most underreported crime in the United State according to the National Victims Center. Since a majority of these crimes occur on a date, victims often blame themselves.

Depression, fear, shame, anger and guilt follow a victim of rape long after the crime. Victims try to push the abuse deep into their minds, but they never forget.

After a rape or sexual assault, women go to the hospital and undergo a pelvic exam. The police will also question her in great detail about the perpetrator and every moment of the crime. She must reveal many of her sexual activities to the police officers as well. These routines sometimes are what scare victims into not reporting the crime.

The only things that can comfort them after the life-threatening act are their families, friends and significant others.

However, Allen Sapp, a professor at Central Missouri State University who teaches a class on sexual assault said, "50 to 80 percent of rape victims lose their boyfriends or husbands after a rape."

Polls change to reduce election cost

City Commission primaries eliminate one, combine other locations

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In a couple of weeks when Manhattan residents head to the voting polls, many will have to change their route.

The Feb. 25 primary election for City Commission marks the first time Manhattan will reduce its number of polling locations from 32 to 13.

The reduction will save the state $4,000 to $6,000 per election, Jolene Campbell, Riley County deputy clerk, said.

Typically, there are two elections each year, maximizing the state's savings from $8,000 to $12,000 annually.

The need for a reduction derived from the current fiscal year's constraints of non-transferred payments and the 2002 Help America Vote Act, said Rich Vargo, Riley County clerk and election official.

The constraints of transfer payments total $1.1 million, Vargo said.

HAVA, which was passed in response to the 2000 Florida elections, requires each polling place to contain an electronic voting machine. This machine is to aid handicapped persons to vote without assistance.

Each electronic unit costs about $5,000, Campbell said.

"We knew we were going to have to cut down on polling places since the mandated regulations act passed, but the budget problems Riley County is facing right now sped up the process," she said.

The polling places were determined based on adequate indoor facilities, parking, and handicapped accessibility, Vargo said.

As a result, there no longer will be a polling place on K-State's campus. Campbell said people who used to vote on campus now will go to Meadowlark Hills.

Although there are a number of changes, Vargo does not believe they will affect voter turnout.

"We've had to change voting places two days prior to an election and were still successful," Vargo said. "Overall, it will be a more cost-effective manner for Riley County elections and save everyone money."

Election Day information

- Applications for advanced voting for Riley County registered voters can be obtained online at www.co.riley.ks.us/elections.
- Polls for the primary election will be open from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m Feb. 25.

If students are worried about going to the wrong polling place, they can vote in advance.

Advance voting begins in Riley County on Wednesday. The clerks office will be open weekdays from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. for advance voting weekdays. Advance voting ends at noon on Feb. 24.

The clerks office also will be open from 8 a.m. to noon Saturday, Feb. 22, , for advance voters who can't find time during the week to vote.

Advanced voting applications for Riley County voters can be obtained online or at the City Clerk's office.

Applications that are obtained online must be mailed to the office because a signature is required for the processing to be complete.

Once the application is received by the office, a ballot will be sent to the applicant's house.

Powell to offer Iraqi photos, transcripts to U.N.

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Secretary of State Colin Powell will present photographs of mobile biological weapons and transcripts of overheard Iraqi conversations to convince allies that Saddam Hussein has potent arsenals in defiance of U.N. disarmament demands, an administration official said Monday.

Powell sifted through classified U.S. intelligence on Monday to choose what he will make public on Wednesday to the U.N. Security Council. He is expected to display the photographs and refer to transcripts, an official told The Associated Press.

The chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., said he expected the evidence to show details of a transfer of technology from other countries and the relocation of weapons systems within Iraq.

"He can go into a level of detail with respect to the present maintenance of the stock that he hasn't gone into before," Hunter said in an interview.

Sen. Jay Rockefeller, D-W.Va., said he would not be surprised if Powell disclosed information that had not been made available to Congress.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain rallied anew to support the United States.

"Show weakness now and no one will ever believe us when we try to show strength in the future," he said as he prepared for a meeting Tuesday with French President Jacques Chirac, who is reluctant to go to war at this point.

NASA reconsiders thermal tiles as cause of explosion

By Marcia Dunn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOUSTON – NASA acknowledged Monday that its "best and brightest" minds may have gotten it wrong when they concluded in a report four days before Columbia disintegrated that a flying, 2 1/2-pound chunk of insulation did no serious damage to the shuttle's thermal tiles during liftoff.

Shuttle program manager Ron Dittemore said the agency will re-do the entire analysis from scratch.

"We want to know if we made any erroneous assumptions," he said. "We want to know if we weren't conservative enough."

Practically from the start, investigators have focused on the possibility that a 20-inch piece of foam insulation that fell off the shuttle's big external fuel tank during liftoff Jan. 16 doomed the spacecraft by damaging the heat tiles that keep the ship from burning up during re-entry into the atmosphere.

While Columbia was still in orbit, NASA analyzed launch footage frame-by-frame and were unable to determine for certain whether the shuttle was damaged. But they ran computer analyses for different scenarios and different assumptions about the weight of the foam, its speed, and where under the left wing it might have hit, even looking at the possibility of tiles missing over an area of about 7 inches by 30 inches, NASA said.

The half-page engineering report – issued on Day 12 of the 16-day flight – indicated "the potential for a large damage area to the tile." But it went on to note that the damage should be limited to the coating on certain tiles and have no effect on the mission.

"These thermal analyses indicate possible localized structural damage but no burn-through and no safety-of-flight issue," the report concluded, according to a copy released by NASA on Monday.

High-level officials at NASA said they agreed at the time with the engineering report.

"We were in complete concurrence," Michael Kostelnik, a NASA spaceflight office deputy, said at a news conference Monday with NASA's top spaceflight official, William Readdy.

"The best and brightest engineers we have who helped design and build this system looked carefully at all the analysis and the information we had at this time, and made a determination this was not a safety-of-flight issue."

On Monday, Readdy said the damage done by the broken-off piece of insulation is now being looked at very carefully as a possible cause of the tragedy.

"Although that may, in fact, wind up being the cause – it may certainly be the leading candidate right now – we have to go through all the evidence and then rule things out very methodically in order to arrive at the cause," he said.

The shuttle broke up 39 miles over Texas and fell to Earth just as it was experiencing maximum re-entry heat of 3,000 degrees. All seven astronauts aboard perished.

NASA said temperature data showed that the shuttle's left side heated up sharply just before Columbia disintegrated.

Dittemore said that photos showed the piece of insulation was about 16-by-6-by-20 inches in size and weighed about 2.67 pounds, and could have smashed into the thermal tiles on the underside of the left wing area.

SOLE SENIOR

Tennis veteran recognized on Preseason All-Conference team, takes on multiple roles

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senior leadership is critical for a team to be successful. When your team has only one senior, that can be a lot to ask from a person.

This season, the lone senior for the No. 53 Wildcat tennis team, Petra Sedlmajerova, has taken on dual roles as both player and mentor to younger players.

Coach Steve Bietau said he is expecting a lot from Sedlmajerova, the only Wildcat to be named to the Preseason Coaches All-Big 12 team.

"We're asking more this year in terms of leadership and in terms of helping other players in the program understand what it takes to do well," Bietau said.

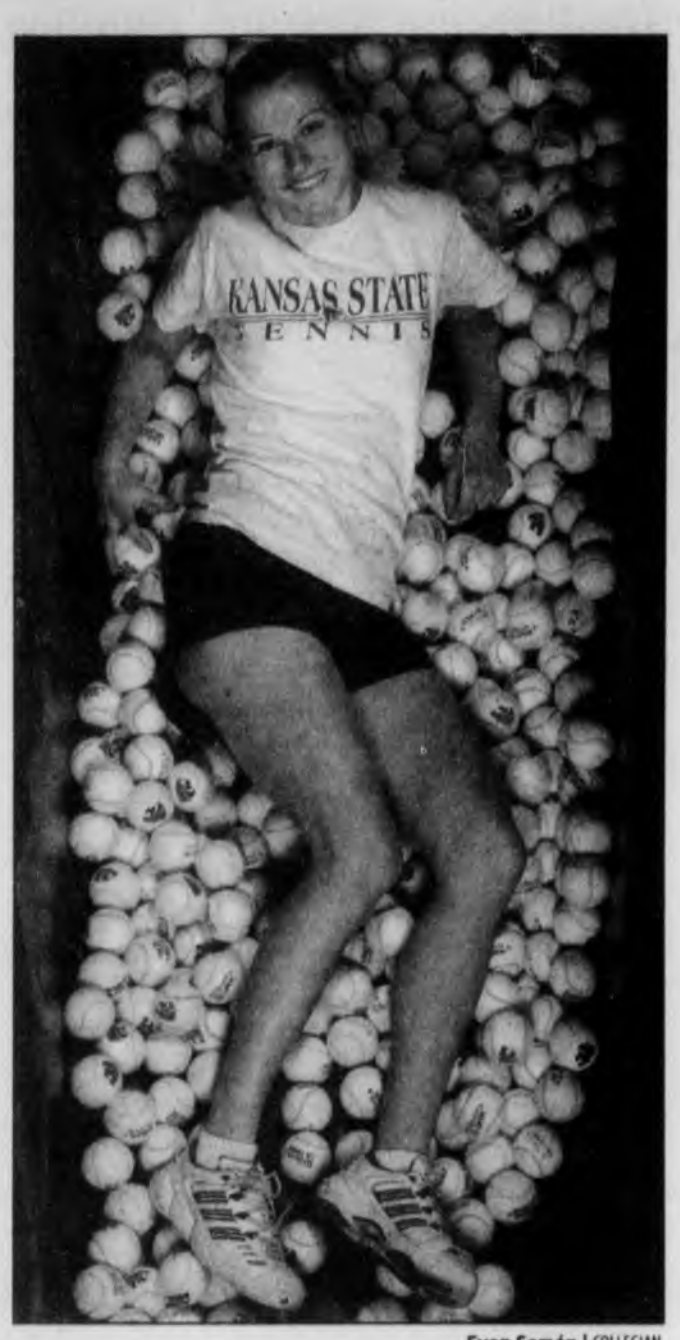
Sedlmajerova showed her leadership on Saturday, helping the Cats to a 6-1 victory over Southwest Missouri State at Ahearn Field House. Playing at No. 1 singles, she defeated the Bears Ia Zozrashvili 6-1, 6-0. She also teamed with Paulina Castillejos in No. 2 singles to beat the team of Marta Rubina and Biljana Gakovic 8-3.

Sedlmajerova said she was pleased with Saturday's performance.

"I played good and fought hard the whole time," she said.

Her goal now is to keep up the momentum from the team's 2-0 start.

"We definitely want to keep with how well we are doing as a team," Sedlmajerova said. "Personal wise, my goal is to keep playing hard and really aggressively and keeping up the good job while preparing for the Big 12 matches."



Last season, Sedlmajerova posted a record of 17-11 on her way to finishing second at No. 3 singles in the Big 12. She was also runner-up at No. 2 singles in 2001.

Other accomplishments by Sedlmajerova include being both the ITA Central Region Rookie of the Year and the Big 12 Freshman of the Year after the 2000 season. She's also been named an ITA Scholar-Athlete and selected to the Big 12 Commissioner's Honor Roll six times.

Bietau said that during her time at K-State, Sedlmajerova has left a positive mark on the tennis program.

"Petra has the experience of a senior and her record over the past three years speaks for itself," Bietau said.

"She's been a very important part of the program and continues to expand what she does."

College basketball | Calhoun has cancer

Connecticut men's coach Jim Calhoun has prostate cancer and is leaving the team for surgery and treatment.

The 60-year-old coach will take a three- to four-week medical leave, with assistant George Blaney taking over on an interim basis. Surgery was scheduled for Thursday.

Calhoun's doctor, urologist Peter Albertsen, said the cancer was detected early and was "relatively low-grade."

Basketball | Wecker could be nation's best

K-State's sophomore standout Kendra Wecker could be the best women's college basketball player in the country, according to an ESPN.com fan poll.

Connecticut junior forward Diana Taurasi leads 10 candidates listed on the "Wade Watch," a fan poll on the site tracking the players most likely to win. As of Monday night, Taurasi gamered 39.8 percent of the vote.

Wecker was second in voting, with 36.4 percent of 705 votes.

The Wade Trophy is women's basketball's equivalent to football's Heisman Trophy.

Equality still represents best decision

Despite the recent buzz about quotas, lawsuits, tinkering and the like regarding Title IX, one simple fact remains in college sports: women deserve a fair shake.

Discussions have again heated concerning the 30-year-old gender equity law and its consequences at America's universities. The talk reached its pinnacle last week during a federal review of the controversial rule, when The Commission on Opportunity in Athletics voted on nearly two dozen recommendations to overhaul Title IX.

DAN SMITH

The committee rightly rejected those suggestions.

Critics of the legislation claim schools have been forced to cut men's teams to comply with what they deem an unfair system. But those complaints come without regard to the opportunities the law provides for women or how effective the rule is at eliminating waste from athletic departments' budgets.

Those views are incredibly short-sighted.

Nowhere in the Title IX legislation does it say men's programs must suffer to allow for equity.

Title IX reforms voted down; policy remains

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 30 years after its passage, Title IX is still criticized by some and praised by as many others.

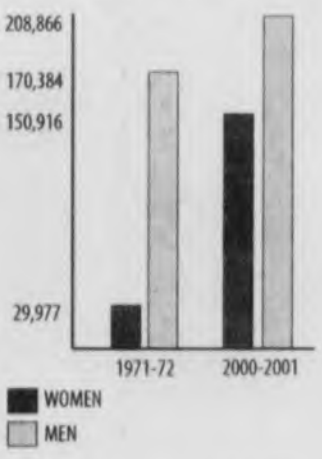
But despite controversy surrounding the law, the 15-member commission, appointed by President Bush to review the law, decided last week that women still deserve equal opportunity.

The law

The Commission on Opportunity in Athletics, which met for their final meeting Jan. 30, failed to pass any sweeping recommendations to Title IX, the Associated Press reported on January 30.

Many, particularly women's rights activists, feared the commission would make recommendations that would weaken the law.

Title IX prohibits gender discrimination in programs that receive federal funding. A "three-prong" test is used to determine compliance. Schools must meet one of the elements.



– Provide opportunities substantially proportionate to each gender's enrollment

– Take measures to expand opportunities for the under-represented sex – Already accommodate the existing athletic interests and abilities of the under-represented sex

Athletes in NCAA sports

In the last 30 years, the number of males participating in NCAA sports has increased by 36 percent. The number of female athletes has jumped 411 percent.

The commission voted to recommend establishing a predetermined number of roster spots on each team that count toward Title IX compliance, rather than the actual number of athletes. Some say this rule would prevent schools from inflating their numbers by having huge rosters.

Also approved was a recommendation to not count walk-ons and non-traditional students as part of a school's male total. This would mostly affect smaller schools, especially community colleges.

The final recommendation by the commission calls for surveys to be used as a tool to demonstrate Title IX compliance.

Associate Athletics Director, Laura Tietjen, said she wasn't in favor of the final recommendation, because it would be difficult to get accurate information.

"That recommendation was a mistake," she said. "I mean, if they were to have surveyed back in 1972, the interest wouldn't have been there either."

K-State is among only 28 percent of schools that use the proportionality standard to measure compliance.

With the addition of women's rowing and equestrian in the last several years, Tietjen said meeting proportionality wouldn't be a problem.

"We are in good shape." she said. "Kansas State has done a tremendous job, especially since the early 1990s."

Furthmore, K-State has also hired an outside consultant, who worked with the Office of Civil Rights for several years, to make annual visits to evaluate and make recommendations

Intramurals bring new, old athletes to the court at Rec Complex

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With college basketball now heating up during conference play, the intramural basketball season is just getting started.

The first games of the new season were played last Tuesday night, and the season continues with games throughout this week.

John Wondra, assistant director of intramurals, said turnout is higher than it was last season.

"We had more teams than we expected," Wondra said. "Last year, we had 340 teams, and this year we ended up with 359."

The increase in teams means more courts will be used to accommodate all the games.

"We've had to run six courts almost every night," Wondra said.

"We were only running five a night last year."

Kelly Glasscock | COLLEGIAN
Carissa Schmitz, freshman in advertising, drives the lane past Jessica Dubin, junior in animal science, during an intramural game at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex on Monday.

One effect of the beginning of intramural basketball is increased floor traffic at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. In fact, more people are visiting the Rec Complex now than at the same time a year ago.

"The Rec is definitely busier than last year," Wondra said. "Part of that could be due to basketball."

Some teams may also choose to practice with their team at the Rec Complex, while others get in shape for the season individually.

"Most of them just come out here and play pickup games, but you do see more individuals shooting baskets," Wondra said of the basketball activity at the Rec Complex.

This is the case for Team Red, led by captain Christina Hering, freshman in biology.

"All of us have gone and shot a little bit, but we're not going to run any plays or anything," Hering said.

All the members of Team Red played basketball competitively in high school. That wasn't the case for the men of Phi Kappa Theta fraternity.

The fraternity's intramural chair Jim Harris said the team's lack of practice was to blame for their 115-8 loss in their first game last Tuesday.

"We haven't practiced," Harris, junior in mechanical engineering, said.

"We're not very well-skilled, and the lack of practice didn't help either. We've only got 21 members in our house now, and out of those, I think we have about 12 guys playing basketball. Out of those 12, only two or three played in high school."

Harris said his squad had more talent last year, but that doesn't keep him and his teammates from getting out there and having fun.

"Last year we had a couple older guys that played high school ball, but we still lost all of our games," Harris said.

"We like playing. We go out there, have some fun and shoot around, not really to practice but just to play the game."

SEXUAL PERSPECTIVES

Students discuss ideas about sex, first dates, importance of having safe sex

Andy Biery| SENIOR IN FINANCE

How do you feel about sex before marriage?
"I'm against it. I was raised in a Christian home and was taught that it wasn't the right thing to do."

Is sex on the first date appropriate?
"No. You don't know anything about the person really. You put yourself at a lot of risk. It would be completely empty. It's a bad deal."

Are there social expectations for college students to be having sex?
"Absolutely. Everybody talks about it. You're cool if you do it. That's what college kids do — go to parties and meet girls and try to hook up with them."

Can sex ruin a relationship?
"Obviously there are the side effects of possible pregnancy and disease. It could create a false sense of love."

Are there any valid excuses for cheating?
"Nope. I think if you really like someone else or you don't like the person you're with you should tell them straight up. It could ruin your dating relationships."

How important is it to be in love before having sex?
"Very important. I think sex is a representation of love and how you feel about somebody. That's really the only way to express true feelings for somebody in a physical sense."

What is your view on safe sex?
"For people who do decide to have sex outside of marriage, it's a great thing. At least you are preventing something. I am in support of that for people who don't have the will power or choose not to."

Who thinks about sex more, men or women?
"Men. Just 'cause I think the physical part is more important for men than women because they put more emotion in."

Is masturbation just as common for both sexes?
"It's common for both. You just hear about it more from the man's side. If I would make a bet on who does it more I would probably say men, but I think it's about equal."

Are you still a virgin if you have had oral sex?
"I think so. Traditional intercourse needs to be a staple of whether or not you are a virgin."

Can friends be lovers?
"Yes, I suppose it would work in the short term. I don't see it lasting long. It seems like a great idea at first, but when you get into it, it can really drive stakes through people."

Rebecca Doeden
SOPHOMORE IN INTERIOR DESIGN

How do you feel about sex before marriage?
"I don't believe in it. My personal beliefs are in chastity and abstinence until you are married. It is my belief that it is the gift you give to your spouse."

Is sex on the first date appropriate?
"I definitely disagree with that. It could make it very awkward. You're really not getting to know the person for who they are. It's kind of a selfish thing. You can lose friends' respect, and you could gain a reputation."

Are there social expectations for college students to be having sex?
"Definitely. I think the media plays a huge role. A lot of people end up conforming to society. Some people are stronger in that way, but it's a huge influence."

Can sex ruin a relationship?
"I know that it can happen. A lot of the thrill in dating is chasing after that. After that, there is no thrill."

Are there any valid excuses for cheating?
"No. If you actually, honestly want a relationship and a good dating experience, you would want to be honest with that person. The biggest part of cheating is dishonesty. A good solid relationship relies on putting the person before yourself."

How important is it to be in love before having sex?
"If both of the people loved each other and felt it was right, then it would just matter on personal beliefs. But yes, you should be in love before you have sex."

What is your view on safe sex?
"Using a form of contraceptive is almost a way of preventing life. Sex is creating a life — that's what it was made for. If you are trying to prevent that from happening, I think it's you being selfish and you wanting pleasure for yourself."

Who thinks about sex more, men or women?
"Men, by human nature. But I wouldn't deny that women don't think about it."

Is masturbation just as common for both sexes?
"I think it is more common for men just because of their genetical makeup. It's not true in all cases."

Are you still a virgin if you have had oral sex?
"I think they are still a virgin because they have not conceived in a sense. But I don't agree with oral sex, basically because it isn't something I would necessarily want to do. In most cases, it's more a person getting pleasure from it than thinking about the other person's needs."

Can friends be lovers?
"I think it's possible, but I don't think they can be the same friends they were before they had sex. If either of them has the same expectation of friends, that's a lost cause."

Chris Coco | JUNIOR IN KINESIOLOGY

How do you feel about sex before marriage?
"Since you're both consenting adults, it is probably up to you and that person. It's kind of an agreement between you and that person."

Is sex on the first date appropriate?
"No. I think sex is something that involves trust between the two people, and to have trust, you need to know that person very well."

Are there social expectations for college students to be having sex?
"Not necessarily. If you are old enough to be in college and make your own decisions, then that is exactly what you should be doing — making your own decisions."

Can sex ruin a relationship?
"Yes. It can add unneeded pressure to the relationship, and school is already enough."

Are there any valid excuses for cheating?
"No. Because if you were cheating on a person, then obviously you shouldn't be in the relationship in the first place."

How important is it to be in love before having sex?
"It is very important, actually. It is something that involves a lot of feelings and trust, and to trust you need to be in love with the person."

What is your view on safe sex?
"It must be used at all times."

Who thinks about sex more, men or women?
"It depends on the individual and what they're in to."

Is masturbation just as common for both sexes?
"I don't know for sure. I think it is probably used just as much for both."

Are you still a virgin if you have had oral sex?
"Yeah, I do. I think intercourse is sex. There's a lot of different types of definitions for sex and each person has their own."

Can friends be lovers?
"Yeah, I do. Sex can also complicate a friendship. Once you've been that far, can you actually go back? It's a tough thing."

Jennifer Payatt
JUNIOR IN MANAGEMENT

How do you feel about sex before marriage?
"I think people should wait. But sometimes waiting doesn't always happen. I don't see it as a bad thing, but I don't think it's a good thing either."

Is sex on the first date appropriate?
"Well, hopefully you know the person you are going out with, and you might be having a feel for them. If you don't really know them, and it's not going to go anywhere, then no."

Are there social expectations for college students to be having sex?
"I don't think there are. Even in high school I never felt anything whatsoever. I don't think there are any pressures at all. But then again, I might be in a different group of people."

Can sex ruin a relationship?
"I think it can. If you start out as friends and then you go into the dating aspect of the relationship and you have sex and then you break up — your whole relationship is down the tubes. And if your partner tries to get you to do other things, it can go to hell in a handbasket."

Are there any valid excuses for cheating?
"No. You shouldn't be with someone if you want to be with 500 people, too. You should be a free agent."

How important is it to be in love before having sex?
"It's nice to be in love before you have sex, but that doesn't always happen. Your hormones take over first usually."

What is your view on safe sex?
"That is a definite, 100 percent. Condoms, birth control, everything. If you're in college, you don't want to be stupid and go around having sex without anything. Hopefully, at this point, everyone has a brain."

Who thinks about sex more, men or women?
"I think it's a tie. Girls just flat out lie and say they don't. Girls are just as horny as guys."

Is masturbation just as common for both sexes?
"No, I think that guys out rate girls on that one. For girls, it's just such a private thing, but at the same time, I know that girls do it. I think guys are definitely way ahead on that one."

Are you still a virgin if you have had oral sex?
"That's a tough one. If you have oral sex, then you aren't an oral virgin. But if you haven't had intercourse, then you are an intercourse virgin."

Can friends be lovers?
"Yeah, I think so. I know there are instances where it wouldn't work— where maybe one of the two have a more emotional attraction to the person and the other one doesn't. Jealousy is a big-time problem."

Leading Oscar contenders offer music, fantasy, revenge, troubled minds

The Academy Awards race looks like a rematch of 2002's Oscar season.

Last year's best-picture contenders included the musical "Moulin Rouge," the sword-and-sorcery adventure "The Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring," the revenge story "In the Bedroom" and eventual winner "A Beautiful Mind," a film biography of schizophrenic mathematician John Nash.

This time, leading prospects for nominations Feb. 11 include the musical "Chicago," the fantasy sequel "The Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers," the vengeance epic "Gangs of New York" and "The Hours," a drama about suicidal author Virginia Woolf and two women with connections to her novel "Mrs. Dalloway."

Latest poll: U.S. public trusts Powell more than Bush on Iraq policy

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Asked whom they trust more on Iraq policy, almost two-thirds said they were likely to trust Secretary of State Colin Powell, 63 percent, more than President Bush, while 24 percent said they were more likely to trust the president, a new poll says.

Powell has been an advocate within the administration of working closely with the United Nations to resolve the Iraq situation. In recent days, as deep divisions have split Europe, Powell has taken a more hawkish stance about the need to disarm Iraq soon.

Support for military action against Iraq was up to 58 percent, compared with 52 percent before the president's State of the Union speech a week ago, according to a CNN-USA Today-Gallup poll released Monday.

But Powell's scheduled appearance before the United Nations to provide evidence about Iraq and win allies for military action could be crucial in solidifying that support, the poll suggested.

Four in 10 said the United States should invade with ground troops only if the United Nations holds a new vote that authorizes the use of troops, while one-third, 33 percent, said the United States should invade even if the U.N. does not hold a new vote. The rest said the United States should not send ground troops into Iraq at all.

Powell heads to the United Nations at a time the public has a great deal of trust in him.

The secretary of state continues to have the highest favorable rating Bush administration, 86 percent, compared with 68 percent for Bush.

Public opinion of Bush's policies has improved since he gave his State of the Union address a week ago. More than half, 56 percent, now say that Bush's policies are moving the country in the right direction. That's up from 49 percent who felt that way just before the speech.

Support for military action against Iraq was up to 58 percent, compared with 52 percent before the speech. Four in 10 said the United States should invade with ground troops only if the United Nations holds a new vote that authorizes the use of troops.

The poll of 1,003 adults was taken Friday through Sunday and has an error margin of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Kansas representatives express opinions on Bush's 2004 federal budget proposal

By Libby Quaid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON– Kansans in Congress gave a warm reception Monday to President Bush's budget for 2004, saying it appeared to boost education and defense spending in their state.

Bush's proposal for a $2.23 trillion federal budget includes some cuts in domestic programs to pay for tax relief, an expansion of Medicare and heightened security at home and abroad.

The president's request serves as a blueprint for Congress as it begins work on bills to pay for government operations for fiscal 2004, which begins Oct. 1. Lawmakers still are finishing work on most of the spending bills from fiscal 2003 as well.

Rep. Todd Tiahrt, R-Kan., said he's not sweating the small stuff, such as fewer water projects for his Wichita-area district.

"This is not uncommon for Kansas, to have to go back and try to fight for their priorities," Tiahrt said.

In the long term, Tiahrt said, "I'm worried about getting back to a balanced budget. It looks like, until we see what happens in Iraq and how homeland security is working, we're probably going to worry more about safety than red ink."

Bush is seeking $22 million for the Army Corps of Engineers to improve habitat for fish and wildlife along 735 miles of the Missouri River through which cargo-laden barges travel on their way to the Mississippi River.

It's one of eight of corps' projects the administration wants to fund at high levels because it says the economic and environmental benefits are significant relative to their cost. That benchmark – yielding the most benefit for the least cost – puts other projects higher on Bush's list.

Beyond those priorities, Bush wants to plow much of the corps' spending into reducing a construction backlog of $23 billion.

As a result, only one Kansas project would get money for construction: the Arkansas City levee, which is being raised and extended to provide standard flood protection for the southern Kansas City where the Arkansas and Walnut rivers meet.

Now 67 percent complete, the levee improvement would see $2.6 million in construction next year under Bush's budget.

Pentagon discusses more deployments

By PAULINE JELINEK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – The Pentagon is considering new deployments in the Pacific Ocean to signal North Korea that the United States remains capable of blunting an attack in Korea despite its focus on possible war in Iraq.

No decision has been made, but Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld is considering options including sending an aircraft carrier to the waters off the Korean peninsula and adding bombers in Guam, officials said Monday.

The United States has 37,000 troops stationed in South Korea, where it has maintained a force since the 1950-53 Korean War ended in a truce.

Tension between Washington and Pyongyang over North Korea's nuclear program has been rising since October, however, and officials said they want to deter the North from provocations during any war to remove Saddam Hussein as Iraq's president.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said President Bush still believes the North Korean standoff can be resolved peacefully.

"That doesn't mean the United States won't have contingencies and make certain those contingencies are viable," Fleischer told reporters.

Rumsfeld held a 45-minute meeting Monday at the Pentagon with Chyung Dai-chul, a special envoy for the South Korean president-elect, Roh Moo-hyun, who takes office Feb. 25.

Chyung is on a weeklong Washington visit, to include talks Tuesday with Secretary of State Colin Powell.

Rumsfeld and Chyung discussed the future of the U.S.-South Korean military alliance and the need for updating and modernizing it, according to a Pentagon spokesman, Navy Lt. Cmdr. Jeff Davis.

"They also discussed North Korea and the need to continue working together for a peaceful solution," Davis said.

American officials disclosed Friday that spy satellites had detected what appeared to be trucks moving spent fuel rods from a North Korean nuclear facility.

It was viewed as a possible sign Kim Jong Il's government might be preparing to process the rods to produce nuclear weapons, which would be an escalation of the confrontation that has developed with the United States since October.

The Navy has long had a carrier deployed to the Pacific region, home-ported in Yokosuka, Japan.

But because of the possibility that the carrier there, the USS Kitty Hawk, could be ordered to the Persian Gulf, officials were considering sending another to the Korean area – possibly the USS Carl Vinson, which is on exercises in Hawaii, or the USS Nimitz, which is in port in San Diego.

In that sense, a carrier in the region would not be an addition, although having it on station off the Korean coast would be uncommon, one official said.

Officials also are considering sending B-1 and B-52 bombers to the Pacific island of Guam, which would be additions.

The administration has said it favors a diplomatic rather than military solution to problems on the peninsula and has tried to play down the crisis. The dispute has been growing since October, when U.S. officials said the North had admitted having begun a second nuclear program despite a 1994 agreement with Washington that was to have stopped such activity.

Washington and its allies suspended oil shipments to North Korea in November that had been promised by the Clinton administration deal.

The oil was to have compensated for electricity production lost when North Korea ended its nuclear weapons program and mothballed its reactor at Yongbyon, north of the capital, Pyongyang.

The Bush administration stopped shipments after learning that North Korea had restarted development of nuclear weapons.

In response to the suspension, Pyongyang has moved to restart its first nuclear program, which was suspected of being used to make atomic weapons, and expelled U.N. monitors and pulled out of a global nuclear arms control treaty.

At the Yongbyon complex, North Korea has stored some 8,000 spent rods that, if reprocessed, could produce enough plutonium to make four or five nuclear weapons, U.S. officials have said.

Committee narrows down designs to replace World Trade Center site

By MICHAEL WEISSENSTEIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK – Officials overseeing the effort to rebuild ground zero met privately Monday to pick the final two designs to replace the World Trade Center.

Matt Higgins, a spokesman for the Lower Manhattan Development Corp., said the committee "reached a consensus" during its four-hour meeting. He wouldn't elaborate.

A design that evokes the original trade center with twin latticework towers, and another that exposes the foundation walls of the old towers emerged as leading contenders in recent discussions. Higgins said an announcement on the finalists would be made Tuesday afternoon, with a final choice planned later this month.

Six of the eight members of the committee charged with picking the finalists came from the Lower Manhattan Development Corp., the agency created to rebuild downtown Manhattan, and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the trade center site.

A source familiar with the rebuilding effort said development corporation staff and board members meeting last month favored designs from the team of architects known as THINK and from Daniel Libeskind.

The THINK team, led by New York-based architects Rafael Vinoly and Frederic Schwartz, proposed the World Cultural Center, whose lacy 1,665-foot towers have been called 21st-century Eiffel Towers.

Libeskind, who designed Berlin's Jewish Museum, proposed starkly geometrical buildings clustered around the foundations of the fallen towers and topped by a 1,776-foot spire.

Each features structures rising higher than the tallest in the world, Malaysia's 1,483-foot Petronas Twin Towers.

While no one expects an exact replica of any of the models to rise at the trade center site, officials at the development corporation have said whatever is built there will be based on one of the plans.

The plans for rebuilding the area came from seven teams of architects from Berlin, London, Amsterdam, Tokyo, New York and Los Angeles and were selected from 407 submissions. A first group of plans, released in July, was derided as boring and overstuffed with office space.

NASA | K-State graduate remembers similar tragedy

"There is not a sense of fear," he said. "When you get up and go to work in the morning, there is a chance you will get killed in your car. When you climb on an airliner, there is a chance it might crash.

"If you allow that fear to take over your life, you couldn't do your job. There is grave concern on everybody's part to do a good job. Everyone understands that it might not be enough. That at any given time, something unexpected can happen. That's what happened Saturday."

Part of the unexpected occurrences in space travel, Reiber said, are the part of discovering new frontiers.

"The people that work in the space program live with this kind of concern," he said. "The best parallel for something of this significance is what test pilots have lived with for years. Many lives with lost in testing new aircraft.

"You have a situation in space when you are in a regime that is deadly if anything goes wrong. Humans aren't designed to be in a vacuum. When those things happen, there just is not a whole lot you can do to prevent what happened Saturday or with Challenger."

Watching news coverage of the Columbia tragedy brought back Reiber's memories of looking up into the sky as Challenger exploded on Jan. 28, 1986.

"It was just a shock," he said.

"It was an explosion coming directly overhead. We didn't know what was happening when the explosion occurred. We had never seen anything like that before.

"Not too long we saw debris trails similar with this accident. You get a ball of fire and debris trails. There is somewhat of a visual understanding of what you are seeing."

After the Challenger explosion, NASA came to a three year standstill. Reiber said he doesn't expect the same consequences of the Columbia tragedy.

"I doubt very much they know what the future will be like. We had almost three years of literally having the program shut down because we didn't have a shuttle to work with. If we have that kind of impact from this loss, the impact would be severe. There is so much riding on it now with the space station in orbit," Reiber said.

"I don't think the aftermath of this accident will be the same as the Challenger."

RCPD | Police to enforce driving handbook standards

and announced at the end of the previous month.

Boyda said the program was started Jan. 6. Warnings were issued for the first two weeks, but now citations will be issued for any car following closer than one and a half car lengths to the car in front of it.

This type of citation use to only be issued in the event of an accident but will now be enforced under all circumstances.

Boyda said they will take into consideration if a car slows down or stops to make a turn. However, heavy traffic, such as that on game days, will not make a difference and citations will still be issued.

The driver's handbook states that a safe following distance is one car length for every 10 miles per hour that a car is traveling. However, on average, cars follow between two to four car lengths behind the car in front of them regardless of speed.

"About 30 percent of people that follow too closely are talking on cell phones," Boyda said.

There is no stated law on a safe driving distance, but city and county officials determined that citations will be issued if a car is following within one and a half car lengths of the car in front of it.

Boyda said that in the last year, 1,454 of the 2,329 accidents that occurred in Riley County were due to inattentive driving, failure to yield, improper backing and following too closely.

"We felt that the greatest impact would come from patrolling cars following too closely, which attributed to 5 - 6 percent of last year's accidents," Boyda said.

The cost of following too closely will total $119 for those who are impatient; a $60 fine and a $59 court fee, Boyda said.

"I hope that this process will be effective. We know that doing nothing isn't effective," Boyda said.

"Knowing that we're out there looking for people following too closely will hopefully make them think about it and slow down a little."

TITLE IX | Exemplary performances result of law

to the university.

"This is a proactive approach," Tietjen said. "He's been excellent in terms of getting an outside perspective. It has been a very good process."

The consultant will visit K-State the week of Feb. 17 to help the athletic department determine where it stands in terms of Title IX compliance.

The debate

Critics of Title IX argue that male sports are often eliminated to fill the proportionality test of Title IX.

While those cases might exist, volleyball coach Suzie Fritz said the intent of the law isn't to deny opportunities.

"The original intent of Title IX was never to hurt or eliminate or decrease opportunities in men's programs, but unfortunately, there are only so many dollars to go around," Fritz said.

"I don't think it is fair, but sometimes meeting the Title IX standards means not having the financial resources to put into other area and difficult decisions have to be made to comply with the law."

On the flip side, though, Tietjen said she thinks some administrators tend to blame Title IX when the decision to eliminate sports has more to do with finances.

"Sometimes the money just isn't there to do everything," she said. "Administrators have to cut programs, and unfortunately, I think, Title IX is often used as the excuse."

The local insight

Athletes, though they seldom speak the phrase Title IX, are affected by the law in numerous ways.

"Really, Title IX is what initially got all of us women started with athletics in college," junior volleyball player Lauren Goehring said. "And today it gives us the opportunity to stay competitive."

Sophomore volleyball player Gabby Guerre said Title IX is more to be in compliance with at K-State.

At K-State, she said, women's sports shine because of the effort put into the programs by administrators and athletes.

"You want to get out of something what you put into it. That's the case here," she said. "I think we are seeing really good results here with womens' sports."

The Title IX debate won't end with the commission's report though. Tietjen said the law has received a lot of attention, and she doesn't think the debate will soon end.

"I think, with this report, the potential is there that the door has been opened for some changes to be made," she said. "We'll just have to wait and see if that's positive or negative."

The results

Stand out performances in women's athletics programs at K-State are a model of what the law has accomplished.

The women's basketball team advanced to the Sweet 16 last year for the first time under Coach Deb Patterson.

K-State volleyball earned its first NCAA Tournament appearance in 1996 and has returned to the tournament every year since.

In its first season, three equestrian riders advanced to national competition.

And women's track owns K-State's only national championship.

This success story, Tietjen said, wouldn't be possible without Title IX.

"Without Title IX, it's hard to imagine we would have the success we have today," Tietjen said. "It moved the process along, and it gave individuals the opportunity to excel in sports that, when Title IX was initiated, weren't a priority for women."

EQUALITY | Regulation creates positive benefits

Neither does it require any hard evidence, in the way of percentages, as a proof of a program's success.

That means a school can keep all its men's programs and have more male athletes than their female counterparts as long as they provide some opportunity for women.

In fact, colleges can get by with merely proving that "the interests and abilities" of female students have been "fully and effectively accommodated."

But like most other things on a college campus, it all comes down to money – at least the anticipation of money.

However, the argument that women's sports take away from profit potential doesn't hold water either.

Believe it or not, Title IX actually saves K-State money.

The athletic department's top-two drains are football and men's basketball.

Fewer female athletes receive costly scholarships and women's coaches make less than men's. The long and short of it is women's sports cost less than men's.

In fact, according to The Chronicle of Higher Education, fewer than 5 percent of athletic departments nationwide finish in the black, showing that drowning men's programs in cash isn't always an athletic department's smartest decisions and, in fact, could be one of its least profitable.

The study reveals NCAA colleges spend $31,000 every year on male athletes – 72 percent more than the $18,000 they spend on female jocks.

Let's all be grateful that we, as rational thinkers and members of an institution that embraces its women's sports, aren't so ignorant about the benefits of Title IX.

RCPD reports larceny cases

Cars parked near CiCo Park vandalized

By Tina Deines
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Five cases of larceny and vehicular damage were reported Monday at apartment complexes near CiCo Park.

Forced door entry and broken windows were reported for the vehicles, which were located in apartment parking lots on Buckingham, Heritage and Lundin streets.

Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department said that because of the continuity of the means of entry into the vehicles and their closeness in proximity, investigators believe the incidents are related.

"It's believed that they are tied together," Moldrup said. "There is a similar method of operation, so it would appear that they are related."

The main motive, Moldrup said, was theft of stereo equipment.

While he had no comment on possible leads, Moldrup said the investigation is ongoing.

Moldrup said areas such as apartment complex parking lots are frequently targeted because they hold so many cars.

Many of the cars are owned by college students, Moldrup said, who are more likely to have sound equipment.

Drugs seized after search

RCPD finds more than $4,000 after serving warrant

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As part of an ongoing investigation of crack cocaine distribution, the Riley County Police Department recovered a small amount of marijuana along with other items used for distribution Monday.

At 9:34 p.m., a search warrant was served at 730 Allen Road, No. 88. The search led to seizure of paraphernalia used for both cocaine and marijuana distribution.

Also seized were $4,375 in cash, a 2000 Saturn and various electronic items.

Officers arrested Andre Murphy for possession of drug paraphernalia, possession of marijuana and obstruction of the legal process.

Bond was set at $5,000 and Murphy was released on bond.

RCPD Capt. Gary Grubbs could not comment on the length of the investigation, but additional charges are anticipated in the future against more individuals as the investigation continues.

WTC finalists picked

Architecture professor member of design team

By Jessica Packard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State architecture professor contributed to one of the two designs announced as the finalists being considered for the World Trade Center site.

Robert Arens
ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF ARCHITECTURE

Robert Arens, associate professor of architecture, joined Daniel Libeskind's Berlin-based team to propose one of 406 submissions originally created for a memorial and reconstruction of the World Trade Center.

The THINK team, led by New York-based architects Rafael Vinoly and Frederic Schwartz, was the other finalist chosen among nine proposals that were unveiled on Dec. 18.

The two designs chosen by officials from the Lower Manhattan Development Corp., the agency overseeing the redevelopment of the site, and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, the agency that owned the World Trade Center, announced their decision on Tuesday.

A final decision for the design chosen for the memorial is expected to be announced later this month.

Both models include a vision for a memorial for the victims and families. Nearly 2,800 people were killed in the attack on the World Trade Center on Sept. 11, 2001.

Arens worked on several aspects of the design, but focused on the urbanization of the design's structure.

"We wanted to establish a strong sense of urbanism," Arens said.

The Libeskind team created a design with several aspects that it felt were important to incorporate in the design.

The design includes six to seven buildings located around the foundation of the original towers with a 1,776-foot spire. The spire will include gardens that people can view at several different observation levels.

On the ground level, the structure includes the Wedge of Light, a plaza-style location on the eastern side of the design, and the Park of Heroes, gardens located on the western side of the intended site.

Arens said there are

Genny Short, freshman in open-option and assistant director of the musical, "How to Eat Like a Child," asks for advice on scene development from former drama teacher, Nancy Pujol, now assistant principal of Susan B. Anthony Elementary School.

K-State freshman coaches middle school actors

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Genny Short can go from swinging on trees to talking on the telephone in three seconds flat. She bounces up and down giving directions, all the while with a smile on her face.

Short, freshman in open-option, devotes an hour and a half of her day to directing middle school students at Susan B. Anthony Middle School. Despite a demanding class schedule and having to park in Aggieville, Short said she really loves her job.

"It's a challenge to get here every day, but once I do, it's well worth the hurry," she said.

It's worth it because play rehearsal is all about having fun, Short said.

It's not uncommon for Short to ignore the giggling and continue teaching. Finally, the laughter stops, and the rehearsal goes on.

The name of the play is "How to Eat Like a Child and Other Ways of Not Being a Grown-up." As rehearsal goes on, teachers stop by to catch a scene here and there. One of the featured guests is assistant principal and former drama teacher Nancy Pujol, whom Short often asks for advice.

Pujol, who taught Short years ago in Manhattan's schools, said she loves theater and likes to check in from time to time.

"I drop by to help, but I don't like to interfere," Pujol said. "She's doing a super job."

Pujol said Short has some challenges when trying to direct seventh and eighth grade students.

Krisina Nilsen and Ashley Reid, both seventh graders at Susan B. Anthony, practice their scene from the play "How to Hang up the Telephone." "I like to act alot. It's my goal for my future, and it's fun," Nilsen said.

"The toughest part is the staging. Kids at this age tend to fidget or look away," Pujol said.

Pujol said another difficult part is getting the children to come out of their shell, especially the girls.

City Commission passes 1st reading of traffic ordinance

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first reading of a Wal-Mart ordinance authorizing the creation of a Transportation Development District for the store was unanimously passed at the City Commission meeting Tuesday night.

"It's a win-win situation," Rich Seidler, city commissioner, said. "The intersection needed to be taken care of anyways, whether Wal-Mart was going to be there or not, and they're going to pay for it."

The TDD will issue an excise tax on Wal-Mart's retail sales. This tax will be used as a source of revenue in which Wal-Mart will be able to pay off bonds that Manhattan would issue to fund the projects.

The excise tax will be 1/2 percent.

The principal amount of the TDD bonds were proposed not to exceed $4,231,750.51.

While there was no public comment, the commissioners were excited about the progress.

"It's really good to see us moving forward and dealing with different transportation issues," Mark Taussig, city commissioner, said.

He said he hopes Manhattan can use TDDs in the future to fund projects.

Another issue at the commission meeting was the economic development assistance for the Auth-Florence Manufacturing plant.

BANTER AND BELLOW

1980s favorites include toys, cartoons; decade marred by unattractive styles

LAYTON

Where would we be today if it weren't for America's scotch- and semen-soaked experience in '80s rock 'n' roll? All hail to the rock gods of complete excess. Bands like Guns 'n Roses, Skid Row and Motley Crue exemplified all that is dirty, nasty, hot-rockin' and brutally cool at the same time.

Every day I thank my lucky stars for the chance to have owned all the G.I. Joes, He-Man, and Star Wars action figures I could get my hands on. My favorite Joes were Dusty, Flint, Roadblock and Snake Eyes. These guys could scissor-kick any fool who was out of line.

I also miss the hot cartoon chicks. Smurfette from "The Smurfs" and Jessica Rabbit from "Who Framed Roger Rabbit?" were both unbelievably smokin' hot. I miss them.

Yet, all good things must die, as well as the bad.

The bad would have to be that "so unusual" Cyndi Lauper. Damn, that chick was loco. The Care Bears can kiss my butt, and so can Teddy Ruxpin.

Thank Allah we're finished with tight-rolled jeans, glitter and mile-high bangs, all of which make me queasy.

Another dumb idea was slap bracelets. This is the only thing in American culture that made it fun for kids to slap. Geez, everybody knows that fun slapping is for grown-ups.

But one of the worst ideas from the '80s was Reagan's "trickle down" heap of poo. Yeah, go ahead and trickle down all you like ... down your leg.

Question

What are the best and worst things to come out of the 1980s?

You can email Banter and Bellow columnists Dana Strongin, junior in print journalism, and Layton Ehmke, senior in print journalism, at banter@spub.ksu.edu.

DANA

What came out of the '80s? Well, me, for starters. But I'll admit there might be more important elements from this long-gone decade.

The clothes of the '80s were so outrageously awful. They were marred by colors that made everyone look like they are on the verge of puking: magenta, neon green and highway-worker orange.

Everyone had a faded jean jacket. The real rebel menfolk wore Hammer pants and sported goofy, shaved-on-the-side haircuts. The chicks had leggings, big shirts and bunchy socks – not the most flattering of looks. The spritzed, teased hair was the worst. Remember, bigger is not always better.

My brother, who literally knows everything there is to know, says the '80s are on the return. He thinks we'll be break dancin' down the street in '80s garb in no time. But he sorta liked the corporate-greed-I'm-gonna-get-mine suited look.

That didn't affect us back then, but it would now as we prepare to enter the work force. I'd rather be sporting the casual dress look. Let's keep life simple.

My first tapes – remember those? – were Salt-N-Pepa's "Very Necessary" and Boyz II Men's "Cooleyhighharmony." These cassettes got a lot of play in the ol' boom box. And really, ladies, there's no shame in revisiting those salty sistas if you're feeling nostalgic.

Are there still Saturday morning cartoons on network TV anymore, or do all the kids have digital cable these days? I used to get up at 6 a.m. to watch "Transformers." Crazy robots weren't my favorite thing from the '80s, but spending time with my brother was.

Now that I think about it, the best thing from that decade was simply being a kid. That, I hope, will come back – at least in spirit.

I'm going to go play outside now.

O'Hara, Stryker 1st to enter race

Pair runs for student body president, vice president

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As student government elections near, the first pair of students has entered the race for student body president and vice president.

John O'Hara and Travis Stryker filed Tuesday to run for the respective positions.

They will kick off their campaign with visitations to student groups in the coming weeks, including a visit to K-State-Salina on Tuesday evening.

Stryker, senior in architectural engineering, said he and O'Hara decided to run because they want to make K-State a better place without asking the students for additional money.

O'Hara, junior in finance, said the and Stryker have realistic initiatives they know they can accomplish if elected.

"We're not saying 'we hope we can get this done,' or 'we'll try to get this done,'" O'Hara said.

"We're saying 'we know we can get this done – we will get this done.'"

O'Hara and Stryker have proposed four platform issues, all of which include elements of the pair's campaign slogan, "Awareness, Access and Accountability."

"We need to make people aware of the problems, we have access to resources that will help us solve those problems and Travis and I will hold the right people accountable to fix the problems," O'Hara said.

O'Hara went on to talk about problems with K-State's current waitlisting system.

"It's inefficient, ineffective and very inconsistent across the university," he said.

The pair proposed to hold the administration accountable to use the $11 per credit hour technology fee toward bettering the wait list system.

Stryker talked about the pair's initiative to increase access to diversity on campus.

He said that although Student Senate already has given financial support to increasing diversity, O'Hara and Stryker will ask the administration to do the same.

The pair also proposed ways to hold the administration and Faculty Senate accountable for making Dead Week a week truly absent of tests, quizzes and assignments so that students can prepare for finals.

Also, O'Hara said that with the increased tuition, the pair will push for increased pay for graduate teaching assistants and student employees.

"GTAs and student employees are great resources that the university truly benefits from," O'Hara said.

O'Hara said that with increasing tuition, students need to see some visible differences on campus.

"We're paying more and the perception is that we're receiving less. We want to make students see that the increase in tuition is causing improvements."

Chirac says France won't change its position on Iraq

By Angela Doland
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LE TOUQUET, France – France refused to cave in to intense pressure from Britain Tuesday to support a U.S.-led coalition ready to take quick military action against Iraq.

With Washington saying a war could be weeks away, President Jacques Chirac calmly appealed for patience, expressing unqualified faith in the U.N. inspectors who are searching for banned weapons in Iraq.

"We must let the inspectors do their jobs," Chirac said at a news conference after a summit with British Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Asked how much time the weapons inspectors should have – weeks or months, he responded: "I can't put a time frame on it. It's up to them to decide."

As to whether France – the leading proponent for a slower, more cautious approach on disarming Iraq – might eventually join a military operation, Chirac said: "We're still far from that ... There is still much to be done in the way of disarmament by peaceful means."

The president declined to comment on what circumstances might compel France to concede that war is the only option.

Chirac is under pressure from all sides.

The French public is overwhelmingly anti-war; meanwhile, Britain has suggested that the United Nations would be discredited if it fails to crack down on Iraq.

France's position is key, as it holds veto power in the U.N. Security Council.

Blair came to this quiet resort on the English Channel hoping to persuade Chirac to support a second United Nations resolution authorizing military action against Iraq.

President Bush has called for a "coalition of the willing" to back him on Iraq and has said that only "weeks, not months" remain for diplomacy.

Blair supports Bush's stance that U.N. backing might not be necessary.

But his government has stressed that it would be better to win Security Council support, which means winning over France.

For the time being, Blair and Chirac agreed to disagree.

"Of course there are the differences that are familiar to people," Blair said – although he cited two common points: "support for the notion of disarming Iraq" and the "belief that this is best pursued through the United Nations."

Britain is sending 35,000 troops to the Persian Gulf to prepare for action.

Chirac has insisted repeatedly that the decision about whether to go to war or not rests with the Security Council – not with the United States.

More students obtaining loans to pay for school

Students can save money by consolidating

By Katie Copeland
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With diplomas in hand, students can't wait to explore the vast freedoms that await them in the real world – or so they think.

For students who have borrowed money to pay for their education, freedom comes with a price – loans.

"I wouldn't be here without them," Richie Byrd, junior in computer engineering, said.

During his four years at K-State, Byrd has accumulated almost $15,000 in student loans, an amount he will have to pay back after graduation.

Without any financial help from his parents, Byrd relies on money from Christmas, summer jobs and loans to stay in school.

With a sticker price surpassing $12,000 per year at a public university, college can be an expensive investment.

As tuition rates continue to climb, more and more students are turning their education into a "buy now, pay later" policy. According to the National Center for Education Statistics, 46 percent of graduating seniors took out loans to pay for college 10 years ago. In 2000, almost 70 percent of seniors had borrowed money.

But taking out a loan is more than just signing a piece of paper – it is making a financial obligation that must be repaid.

"Our goal is not to overload students with loans," said Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance.

Moeder compared student loans to buying a car.

"A car won't last for a lifetime like a degree will," he said.

Moeder said K-State has not seen a dramatic increase in student loans since tuition has increased.

To help students pay off their loans, the K-State Alumni Center recently teamed up with the National Education Loan Network to offer student loan consolidations at lower interest rates, Courtney Marshall, director of member services, said.

The program is open to anyone – not just K-State graduates – who has at least $7,500 in loans. Marshall said the program has received nearly 50 applications to consolidate with more than 400 requests for information since December.

By consolidating loans, students not only can get a lower monthly payment, but a lower interest rate as well.

Nellie Mae, a leading national provider of higher education loans for students and parents, asked its borrowers about 10 years ago whether the benefits of their loans exceeded the downsides, almost three-quarters said "yes."

Now, only 59 percent say the positives outweighed the negatives, the New York Times reported – a sign that if debt continues to rise, students may start shying away from expensive universities, the Times said.

According to Nellie Mae, a student loan center, 62 percent of low-income borrowers said they regretted taking out so much in loans.

"I'm definitely worried," Byrd said.

Betsy Willhite, junior in mass communications, disagreed.

"I don't regret taking out the loans," Willhite said. "I know that I will eventually be able to pay them off.

"An education is worth so much more than just worrying about money," she said.

Greek system worthy of praise for philanthropy

The greek community is sometimes treated like it has secretive policies and hazing practices, but it also contributes to others.

In 2002, the K-State greek community launched a philanthropic event called Up 'Til Dawn that already has raised more money than any other campus's Up 'Til Dawn event in the nation.

Before last year, no campus had ever raised more than $52,000 in a year. While the actual event doesn't take place until April, K-State more than doubled that figure in one semester last fall by raising more than $110,000, according to Greek Affairs records.

The time put into the program have raised the eyebrows of other campuses. These efforts are praised throughout the nation, especially by St. Jude Children's Hospital, to which the money is distributed.

Up 'Til Dawn is another step the greek community is taking to shatter greek stereotypes.

We commend the greek chapters at K-State for the time, effort and money put into philanthropic causes, but also challenge them to keep improving this image. Work like that put into Up 'Til Dawn is worthy of respect.

ANNOYING ROCK

Old age, immature audience ruin concert

MICAH HAWKINSON

I'm getting too old to rock.

Yes, I know that seems melodramatic and premature, but I'm afraid it's a fact.

I realized this simple, profoundly depressing truth last week when I went with some friends to a concert in Lawrence.

The star-studded bill boasted the likes of Vendetta Red, the Juliana Theory and Something Corporate.

I was wearing my favorite concert attire: baggy jeans and a yellow, half-polyester city-league softball shirt from a town I've never been to. I had it all: freedom from the confines of fashion, an ironic postmodern commentary on society and the satisfaction of wearing thrift-shop clothes in public. In short, the stage was set for me to rock out.

And I, sad to say, came up short.

My discomfiture set in shortly after we arrived at the concert's venue – a rundown, smoke-filled public house known variously as the Granada or the Granasty, depending on who you ask.

We got there during Vendetta Red's last song, which sounded vaguely like an exploding steam pipe combined with one of those chainsaw competitions they always put on ESPN2 when all I really want to see is some Williams sisters tennis action.

Apparently, the sound person had just learned how to use the distortion and echo features, and he was still overly excited with his discovery.

The result was a festival of pain in my cochlea–cavity, and I was invited. Oh, the fiery, fiery anguish.

But it didn't stop with the acrid stench of tobacco smoke and the cacophonous banshee of ear-shattering aural pollution. No, if those had been the only drawbacks, I would have gladly rocked to the groovin' tunes of Something Corporate and been on my way with a song in my heart.

Unfortunately for humanity, the pain went deeper than mere sensory annoyances. The worst part of the experience was the enormous number of high school music geeks.

You probably know the breed. They're a lot like their older counterparts, the record store clerks – they dress pretentiously, talk more than anyone wants them to and can't seem to understand that it's just music.

The main difference between these kids and most record store clerks is that the clerks tend to know what on God's green earth they're talking about. I had to stand in front of a group of these pretentious teens for periods of up to 30 minutes without the blessing of eardrum-splitting music to drown out their inane, irrelevant conversation.

Certain things should never be inflicted on anyone, which is why the Geneva Convention was drafted. In my humble opinion, they should add "having to listen to obnoxious know-it-alls" to the list of crimes against humanity.

There is nothing quite as annoying as listening to a flock of geeks argue about minutia that, in the long run, don't matter a whit to anyone except the arguers.

If I ever have to listen to another discussion about the relative merits of various $5,000-range concert amplifiers, I will stab myself in the face with a rusty length of rebar.

Most annoying, though, were the conversations these kids obviously knew nothing about.

Dating, for instance.

You could tell from one look at them that they'd never had – and probably never will have, for that matter – any opportunity to learn about what comprises a healthy dating relationship.

I'm getting old, all right. And even though I can stand the deafening music and lingering odors of stale smoke and flat beer, I don't know if I'll ever be able to handle being around kids who remind me that much of myself when I was their age.

Micah is a senior in English and history. You can e-mail him at micah@k-state.edu.

Media robbing children of imagination, activity needed

With a faded blanket and stuffed animal in hand the young boy smugly surveys the scene before him. Will he fearlessly explore the universe or save the world from villains on this trite spring day?

A sneer slides across his grubby face as he staunchly tucks the faded blanket tightly into the back of his shirt. With his cape, his powers are infinite.

Nothing can stop him now.

Racing across the lawn with his stuffed tiger clasped tightly in his little hand, he saves the universe in a single afternoon. When the slanting rays of the sun droop across the lawn, his mother's voice pierces through the dusk. With a sigh the boy trudges indoors.

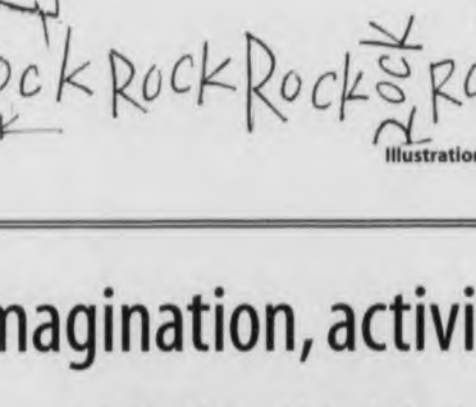
What happened to the Calvin and Hobbes childhood?

The explosion of X-box, Game Boy, Super-Nintendo, TV and computers has drastically changed the face of childhood. Being bored use to force children to use their imaginations to create their own amusements. Now, when monotony appears to be a slight threat, a child can flip a switch and be instantly entertained.

This situation must be addressed as a problem.

On the web site, www.parentcoaching.com, the article "Raising Media Literate Children," excerpted from the book Safe by Design published by "The Committee for Children," stated the average elementary-school-age child watches TV four to five hours a day. This figure does not include time spent playing video and computer games, watching rented videos and going to movie theaters.

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH



When we look at the media's effect on children, we tend to focus on violence and aggression issues.

Video games and TV containing violence direct our focus to remove violence from programs marketed to children. Researching situations such as Columbine left us questioning what effect media is having on children and young adults.

We looked at the movies, games and music the killers were listening to. However, when we look at G.I. Joe figures and old super heroes slaying their foes, we question whether television and media are the culprits for the rise in child and adolescent violence. Chris Rock answered this question by posing this query: "What did Hitler have in his CD player?"

While the question of media reflecting violence or violence reflecting media leaves room for debate, children being robbed of their creativity and imaginations is often overlooked.

Children are developing life-altering skills in their early childhood. Their brain development during this crucial period will affect facets such as their attention-spans, learning abilities and problem-solving skills in adolescence and adulthood.

When you put a child in a room or outdoors with minimal toys and no outside entertainment, you are forcing him to use his own brain to entertain himself.

The child is thinking, "Hmmm, I have this stick and a pile of dirt. What to do?" Five minutes later he focuses on digging a tunnel to another world, all the while imagining the exciting things he is going to do when he reaches his magic land.

Ignore the whining, screaming and crying. Kick your children outside and teach them to think for themselves.

Students and faculty arrested for charity

Up 'Til Dawn Captured for Kids raises money, awareness in Manhattan

By Emily Meissen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN
Sgt. Don Stubbings and Lt. Richard Herrman, both of KSU police, arrest Heather Centlivre, sophomore in architectural engineering, to raise money for St. Jude Children's Research Hospital. Students who were arrested had to call people to raise money to make bail.

Worried faces and confused stares met Robert Mellgren as he stood in the doorway of Calvin 102. Dressed in his full police uniform, Mellgren, assistant director of KSU Police, reached for his handcuffs as he peered around for a couple seconds before announcing that he had a warrant for Joye Gordon. Amid a hushed classroom, the teacher stepped forward and put out her hands to be cuffed.

Before Gordon was escorted out, Megan Barr, senior in journalism and mass communications, stood up to explain to the class that she had paid to have Gordon captured as part of the Up 'Til Dawn fund-raiser, Captured for Kids.

Up 'Til Dawn participants transformed the Union Courtyard into a mock jail Tuesday, holding students captive for an hour or until they raised at least $75 for the St. Jude Children's Research Hospital.

For a fee of $10, students could have someone "arrested" and taken away by campus police. To make bail, those captured used cell phones donated by Cellular One and ALLTEL to call friends, family or coworkers and ask for donations for St. Jude's.

"Our desired amount was around 50 people," Up 'Til Dawn executive director Sol Pettit-Scott said. "We had 49 or 50 people participate, so we hit it right at where we wanted. As far as success, it was 100 percent successful. Whether it would have been one or two people, or 49 or 50 people, it was a success if we are raising the morale and saving the lives of children."

Pettit-Scott and Brett Rundle, fund-raising director for Up 'Til Dawn, contacted more than 80 students and faculty earlier in the week to inform them they would be captured and to set up a time for them to come into the Union.

"I wanted to do this because I know this particular fundraiser really does help out these kids," Shane Collins, sophomore in open-option, said. "It really allows them the money financially so they can get medical treatment. Their lives are bad enough, and it is nice to know we are doing something to help them out. "

From 11 a.m. to 3 p.m., volunteers raised $4,155 in pledges to add to the $112,000 already earned by a letter-writing campaign in October.

Alex Ball, freshman in business, raised the most in pledges individually, earning $150.

"I was really impressed by the students and faculty who came out to support the event," Rundle, sophomore in business, said. "They really put a lot of effort into it.

"I was especially impressed by the people who were not signed up, but still came to give of themselves."

"We had one guy who just came in and sat down, and he ended up raising about $100," Rundle said. "He got his picture taken, and asked if he could come back and call some more people."

As volunteers finished calling for pledges, they took a picture in striped uniforms and handcuffs next to a judge or police officer. Rundle said they will be turning the pictures into wanted posters and e-mailing the pictures to the volunteers.

Pettit-Scott said the primary focus of Captured for Kids was to raise awareness on campus and to get people involved who had not been a part of the effort yet. He said he thought having the mock arrests on campus helped to draw attention to the event.

"When we called and talked to people, there was one girl who said she wanted to run when the police came to arrest her," Pettit-Scott said. "So we had two officers come and outsmart her so she couldn't run.

"One was in the hallway of Durland, spotting her out, and another officer came around the corner walking towards her at the same time. When she saw him, she turned around and starts jetting and runs right into the other officer. "We took her all the way from Durland to the Union in handcuffs. Her friends were there, and they taped it."

The Captured for Kids event was suggested to Rundle by the regional director of Up 'Til Dawn for fund-raising, but Rundle tailored the idea to K-State, Pettit-Scott said.

"Brett has constructed the event and really made it his own," Pettit-Scott said. "It was a national idea, but it has never seen the kind of success we've seen it have here."

Overall, K-State has raised more money than any other school that has participated in the Up 'Til Dawn program.

"We have been recognized nationally for raising the bar of the program by setting a precedent," Pettit-Scott said. "Before this year, no school had over 60 teams, which would be about 360 people in the events. We have about 100 teams and over 700 people that participate in Up 'Til Dawn in a team atmosphere.

"Before this year, no school had raised more than $52,000, and we have already raised $112,000."

Rundle said he attributes the success mainly to the original letter-writing party, but also to the nature of the people involved.

"In general, people seem pretty friendly and willing to help out here. They really get behind something that is a good cause such as the Up 'Til Dawn program and St. Jude's."

USD 383 board elections lacking competition

Candidates seek to fill 4 open positions; defeat impossible without write-ins

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four positions on the USD 383 school board are open in the April 1 election.

With only four candidates running, each is assured a position except for the possibility of defeat by a write-in candidate, Joleen Campbell, deputy county clerk, said.

Both Roger Brannan and Nancy Knopp will be running for their second term. They have been members of the school board since 1999. Randy Martin and David Coburn will be entering the school board race for the first time.

Randy Martin, 44, owner of Hawley Printing Service Inc., first time running

Why did you decide to run for school board?

"I'm interested in trying to help make the schools better. I have kids in school, and I thought it was my turn to try to make a difference."

Roger Brannan, 63, retired debate and forensics teacher, running for second term

Why did you decide to run for school board?

"I was a teacher for 37 years. My mother and other relatives were teachers, so I had an interest in education. I went right into teaching after college. Something happened with poor administration at the end of my career that I thought was wrong, so I decided to run and see if I could correct that."

David Coburn, 47, manager of The Pathfinder, first time running

Why did you decide to run for school board?

"I've got kids in school, and I got involved in some things in district and decided I wanted to get more involved."

Nancy Knopp, 50, director of social services at Mercy Health Center, running for second term

Why did you decide to run for school board?

"Because I have four years of experience on the board and issues that I still would like to have a voice on. I have a son in high school. I'm an interested parent."

IS GOD CALLING YOU AND GETTING A BUSY SIGNAL?
do you feel a longing for more in your life?
do you radiate joy?
do you long to follow in the footsteps of Jesus?

In today's world, it's so easy to lose sight of why we're really here. So perhaps the thought of devoting your entire life to God has never crossed your mind.

Then again maybe it has. Maybe you're the one of the rare women who are being called by God to follow in the footsteps of Jesus. And if you'd only take a moment to really listen to your inner voice God will get through.

We are the Sisters of St. Joseph, an international order with roots right here in Wichita. And we invite you to come live a life of holiness, in a community where we strive for unity and reconciliation among all people with God and with one another. Ours is a community of prayer and service. Our dedication to God motivates us and is the source of joy for all that we do.

But how can you know if you truly have been called? Do you feel a longing for more in your life? Do you feel a void in your heart? Do you radiate joy? Does love pour out of your smile and do you long to follow Jesus?

If so, you owe it to yourself to answer God's call. To learn more about The Sisters of St. Joseph, call or visit us online. You'll be eternally grateful you did.

Team at top in 3rd year

Equestrian prepares for future success

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Five miles west of Manhattan, nestled among the Flint Hills, lies Fox Creek Equestrian Center. In the largest barn, down the rough driveway and past the small lake, four horses paired with four riders trot in ovals.

"Reverse your trot!" yells second-year equestrian coach Lindsay Breidenthal from the center of the ring. The pairs switch direction as a fifth horse and rider join the procession.

Such is the routine of K-State equestrian practices. In its third year, the progress made by the program is evident. This is a program that is already at the top.

"We're sitting first in the NCAA as a Western team and second as an English team, as far as varsity rankings go," Breidenthal said. "We're also first in our region in both our Hunt and our Western teams."

Perhaps the best evidence of the team's success, though, isn't found in the ring, the national rankings or the numerous awards from last season.

More than 120 riders tried out last fall for coveted spots on the team.

"Of those, we probably kept 30 or 35, " Breidenthal said. "We have about 30 riders back from last season and about 60 total."

The weeklong tryouts took place during the second week of class, and each rider had the opportunity to be judged by Breidenthal or assistant coach Meghan Cunningham on everything from mechanics to demeanor.

"I judged them mainly on their talent, how well they rode and got along with unfamiliar horses," she said. "I also looked at them performing a pattern. Basically, we just looked for balance, coordination, and overall ability."

One of the survivors of the tryouts, freshman Western rider Ruth Bradley, said the tryouts were very demanding.

"I was nervous," said Bradley, freshman in agricultural communications and journalism. "This was my main reason for coming to K-State, so I really wanted to be part of the team. There were a lot of girls trying out, so there was a lot of pressure."

While Bradley made the cut, some riders weren't as fortunate.

However, the fact that so many riders were unable to make the team is indicative of the success of the program, Breidenthal said.

"We're very excited when we're able to get that many to come out," she said. "It gives me a chance to look at the variety of what I have and concentrate on the best riders out there.

As the program continues to establish its dominance, Bradley said, she expects even more women to try for a spot on the team this fall.

"A lot of high school seniors have asked me about it, and they're really excited," Bradley said. "We had more girls try out this year than any other, and I'm sure there will be even more next year."

The equestrian team caters to a wide variety of women, but Bradley said most of them have one thing in common.

"Personally, I had to leave my horse at home when I came to college. The team gives people like me a chance to ride while we're here, and it gives us a great chance to improve our skills."

While Bradley and the rest of the equestrian team begins their spring season this weekend at Fox Creek, work continues in the ring as K-State begins the task of fending off contenders for their top perch

"We've really stepped it up this year, and we're ready to have a great season," Breidenthal said.

Green leads tracksters

Junior thrower setting new records

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Cliff Rovelto always had high expectations for junior thrower Rebekah Green.

"When Rebekah came out of high school, she had the longest throw in the country. We kind of expected she'd end up being one of the better girls," he said.

So when Green walked away with the shot put title at the Wildcat Invitational two weeks ago, Rovelto wasn't surprised.

What he hadn't counted on was the way she stomped the competition and destroyed the record book.

Green pulverized the school's previous indoor shot-put record by 11 inches. She improved on her own personal best by more than two feet, and she scorched the competition by 5 feet, 7 inches.

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN
Rebekah Green gets ready to throw the shot put during the KSU All-Comers track and field meet last December at Ahearn Field House. Green won the event with a throw of 53 feet, 7 3/4 inches.

And she's just getting started, Rovelto said.

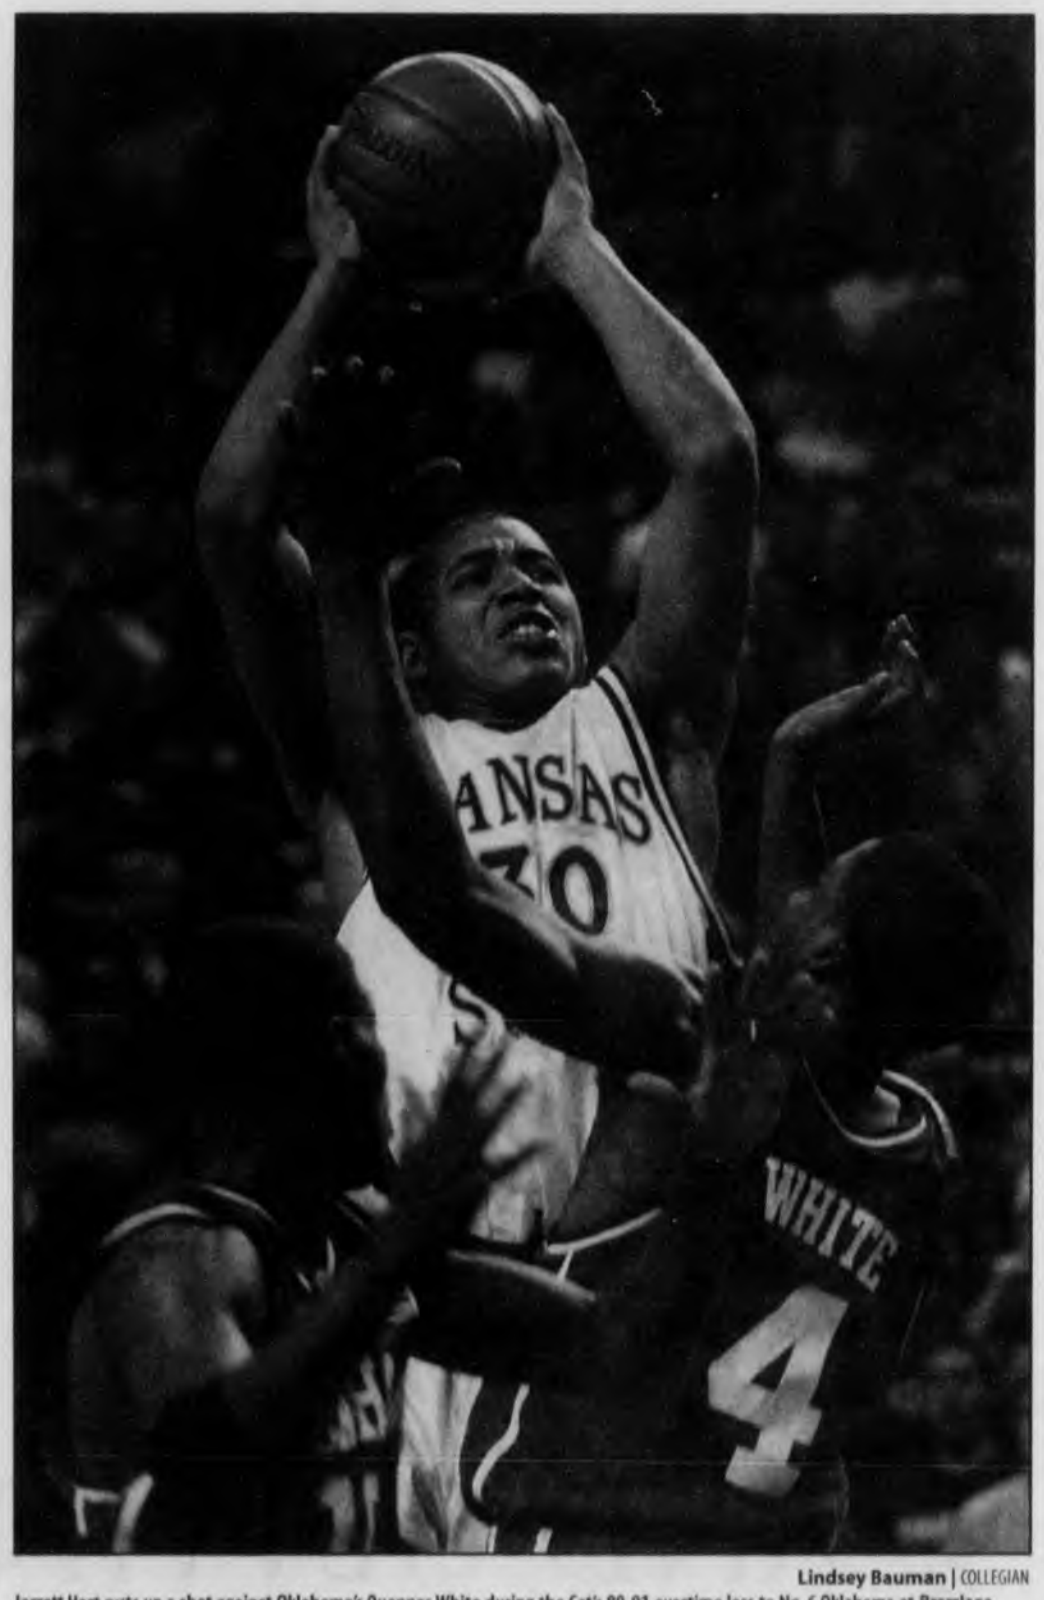
"She was our best thrower for the last couple years," he said. "She had gotten better each year. What she's done this year is just a continuation of what she's done previous years. It certainty isn't unexpected, because she's just that caliber of an athlete."

Green has improved every year, and has already shown marked improvement in 2003. As a freshman in 2000, she finished 20th at the NCAA Championships and threw 50 feet, 4 inches.

Then, as a sophomore, Green broke out. She won the Big 12 Indoor shot-put title and had a season-best throw of 53 feet, 3 3/4 inches.

But it hasn't always been smooth sailing for the Ohio native. A series of accidents held Green off the track during her freshman year.

Once, Green tripped on the toe board that runs around the shot put ring and broke her foot.



The injury kept her from throwing and confined her to the weight room. Rovelto said it was tough for her to not compete, but the result may have helped her get to where she is today.

He said the extra weight training has proven invaluable.

"She had some freak accidents that maybe initially held her back, but during that time she got stronger," he said. "She

Cats look to snatch 1st road win

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's men's basketball team will put its defining characteristics on the line against Oklahoma State tonight.

The Cats (11-8, 2-4) hope to promote their reputation as giant-killers and save their struggling road record when they face off against the Cowboys (17-2, 6-1) at 7 p.m.

The Wildcats have pulled off several upsets during the last year and a half.

The string began against Texas last season. The Cats pulled out a narrow, last-second 71-70 victory to beat the Longhorns. Oklahoma State was also victim last year as K-State rolled to a 70-61 upset over the then-No. 9 Cowboys.

The most recent victim was Texas Tech. Ranked No. 23 on Jan. 11, Bob Knight's boys couldn't hang with the Cats and were never in a 68-44 Wildcat win.

On Saturday, K-State missed an opportunity for yet another large upset versus Oklahoma. Coach Jim Wooldridge said his team isn't dwelling on what could have been, though.

"They are just ready to go play another game and get back on the floor again," he said.

But for the Cats to have a chance to upset No. 12 Oklahoma State, they will have to reverse another trend – that of losing road games.

K-State is 0-3 on the road in the Big 12 this year and finished 0-8 last season. The last time K-State won outside Bramlage Coliseum was

See BASKETBALL Page 8

Road triumph possible; win over Tech not season highlight

SEAN PURCELL

It's about that time.

K-State is smack-dab in the middle of its toughest stretch of basketball – three top-25 teams in a row.

But that's nothing new to this crop of potential giant-killers.

Last season, the Wildcats faced Texas, No. 9 Oklahoma State and No. 2 Kansas in less than a week.

To nearly everyone's surprise, they came away with two wins.

Now to the present. K-State sees its second-straight top-25 team tonight when it battles No. 11 Oklahoma State in Stillwater, Okla.

After losing a heartbreaker to Oklahoma on Saturday, it's hard to tell how the Cats will respond.

To me, it's easy – just exploit the Cowboys' weakness: post play.

Matt Siebrandt and Pervis Pasco are on their games right now.

Siebrandt is fresh off a career effort against the Sooners, one that saw him score 23 points.

What about Pasco? He's only playing his best ball of the year. During the last 13 games, the senior is averaging nearly a double-double.

What about Oklahoma State's big men? Uh, what big men is the real question here.

Stilts Ivan McFarlin may be averaging 11.7 point per game this season, but it's more about what the junior hasn't done lately.

McFarlin is averaging seven points and five rebounds in his last three outings.

Cowboy coach Eddie Sutton is so thin when it comes to post players he sometimes goes with a four-guard lineup.

Although this may cause some problems on the defensive end, they should be able to counter by getting the ball to the post on offense.

The saga evolved that way last season, when the Wildcats whipped Oklahoma State in Bramlage Coliseum.

A 15-point K-State lead at halftime dwindled, but never was overcome by the Cowboys. In that game, super O-State guards Maurice Baker and Victor Williams got theirs, and even McFarlin had a decent game, but it wasn't enough.

Siebrandt and Pasco were twins on the night, each scoring 15 points and grabbing four rebounds.

It's about that time.

K-State is due for a big win, and the Cowboys are just the team to do it against. I don't want to hear about how the Wildcats play poorly on the road. That's only an excuse. They need a solution.

Tonight that solution could come through K-State's post players being active on the offensive end while the Wildcat guards step it up on the defensive side.

That win over Texas Tech in early January was nice, but it doesn't have to be the highlight of K-State's season.

Horoscopes

Aries (March 21 - April 19)
It looks like you are about to flee town, or at the very least will want to. With three planets happily hanging out in your ninth house of long-distance travel, there is no reason to stay home.

Taurus (April 20 - May 20)
As February begins, your career should take off like a firecracker. Exciting news may come out of the blue. Acquaintances might label you an overnight success, but you know better.

Gemini (May 21 - June 20)
This is going to be an extraordinarily positive month for you. Two themes are emerging this month as critical for your growth and development: travel and relationships/teamwork.

Cancer (June 21 - July 22)
With five out of 10 planets filling the two financial sectors of your horoscope, it's clear money is on your mind. Most of those planets will focus on your eighth house of other people's money, including taxes, joint resources, commissions, royalties and windfalls.

Leo (July 23 - Aug. 22)
Though you appear to have plenty to do at work, you might find it difficult to concentrate. Thoughts about your current relationship seem to keep distracting you. If you can take a vacation in February, it would be ideal.

Virgo (Aug. 23 - Sept. 22)
You have been working hard, and have become accustomed to continual interruptions and changes on the job over the past few years. Last month added an extra challenge.

Libra (Sept. 23 - Oct. 22)
This month holds so much promise for love, fun and relaxation. The holidays were demanding and January was very focused on residential, family and career, marking a no-frills start of the year.

Scorpio (Oct. 23 - Nov. 21)
This month will have more ups and downs than a roller coaster, so strap yourself in and get ready for a ride, dear Scorpio. Home, career and money sectors are lit up brilliantly, so there is sure to be news on all three fronts.

Sagittarius (Nov. 22 - Dec. 21)
You've waited a long time to see a near-perfect month, and this is it! You'll love February, for you will land back on track, headed in the right direction. With Mars now in your sign for several weeks you will be in the driver's seat.

Capricorn (Dec. 22 - Jan. 19)
You are on the verge of a breakthrough, but this month you will need to stick to the current program. Keep working on your ideas until. Keep working on your ideas until you feel certain you are ready to unveil them to the world.

Aquarius (Jan. 20 - Feb. 18)
It's a birthday month and you're filled with pride and jubilation. Many planets have gathered in your honor, and you've not had this kind of cosmic support in ages.

Pisces (Feb. 19 - March 20)
Are you ready for the future? A hurricane is on the way, a benevolent one that will pick you up and drop you off in a whole new place. Substantial lifestyle changes are about to replace your life as you know it.

Horoscopes used for both entertainment, decision making

By Stacy Gettings
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today is an excellent day to venture outdoors. Tonight: watch a movie.

This may sound like a daily horoscope from a paper or a junk e-mail, but would it help you decide on your evening activities?

Horoscopes and astrology can be a form of entertainment, but there are those who take it as seriously as some people take their religion.

Leon Rappoport, psychology professor, said he thinks students don't put much faith in the horoscope region of astrology, or even astrology itself.

Even if there are scientific ties inherent in its philosophies, it still isn't credible, he said.

There is scientific evidence that the moon affects bodily fluid systems.

However, students do gravitate more toward zodiac profiles and sign-matching, whether they take it seriously or not, he said.

Tammie Compton, freshman in sociology and criminology, said astrology isn't as credible or respected as other sciences.

"Socially, it's not an established science, so people don't take it as seriously as they do biology or chemistry," Compton said. "But they are fun to talk about."

It's also fun to buy books on the subject, Waldenbooks employee Jenny Hawkins said.

The store sells quite a few books on astrology, she said.

"We have two series of books on the subject. They devote an entire book to each zodiac sign," Hawkins said.

"They talk about love and can give advice that is geared to last year long."

When people take the books home, they may just read the advice or take it seriously, Hawkins said.

In general, astrology is a big seller.

Not only do horoscopes make good conversation topics, Rappoport said, but they often help students make minor decisions.

If the decision is that important, however, most students will be more likely to turn toward established religion, Rappoport said

Elements rule zodiac signs, help users understand personalities

All the astrological signs are evenly divided into four main elements: fire, earth, air and water. Professional astrologers call these the "triplicies" because each element rules three zodiac signs.

Knowing what element rules your sign will help you understand many of your most basic personality traits.

Fire (Aries, Leo, Sagittarius)

Fire signs are full of power and light. They are highly creative and burst with enthusiasm and energy. Fire signs enjoy playing with new ideas and concepts, so it is no wonder they are the trendsetters of the zodiac. Others are drawn to these charismatic, natural sparklers, which are born leaders Their high ideals, broad vision, passion and assertive, can-do attitude is inspirational and contagious. Fire signs have plenty of courage and initiative.

Fire signs have strong egos, so being the center of attention comes naturally to them. People in this group put a strong emphasis on individuality and independence, so don't hem them in.

Earth (Taurus, Capricorn, Virgo)

The earth element is all about imposing form, structure and foundation to projects, businesses and just about anything else that needs it, for earth signs build things. Earth signs turn dreams into reality, whether their own or those of people around them.

Dedicated and responsible, you can count on an earth sign for good follow-through. Earth signs have a talent for harnessing available resources and making the most of them. They are perceptive and realistic – you won't find any self-delusion here. Another earth sign asset is an uncanny precise sense of timing, a big advantage in any endeavor. They are loyal, patient and stable too, and their naturally cautious, conservative personality prevents them from rushing in and squandering time, money or labor.

Air (Gemini, Libra, Aquarius)

Air signs are all about the movement and communication of ideas. These are the most intellectual of the signs. Restless and curious, air signs continually hunger for new ideas.

They are rational, versatile, verbal, quick, and alert. They know that they can charm their way out of anything and are resourceful enough to make good things come from difficult situations. Gregarious and social, they love to collect information, study it objectively, and then disseminate it to everyone else. Air signs are the zodiac's information processors.

Water (Cancer, Scorpio, Pisces)

Water takes many forms – it can be a liquid, it can be a gas (as in steam), or it can be frozen.

Torrents of passion well within water signs and they feel things deeply.

However, water signs are always emotionally reserved, no matter what impression they might give on the surface. Still water, it as been said, runs deep, and the mystery about water pertains to this group. A water sign will always become quiet or withdrawn when it is trying to sort things out.

They realize their intense emotions hold tremendous power, and they tend to handle their feelings carefully. When they fall in love, water signs love with their whole hearts and all their devotion.

After documentary, Kuwait filmmaker turns camera to looming war

After making a deeply pro-American documentary about Sept. 11, an Arab Muslim filmmaker is turning his camera to a feature set against the background of a possible war with Iraq. For Walid Al-Awadi, filming the buildup of U.S. troops in his native Kuwait brings back memories of picking up a home-video camera and recording his countrymen hiding in basements while Saddam Hussein's army looted their nation for seven months in 1990-91.

Vince Gill goes back to the bars with new album, tour

Amid clanking beer bottles and a fog of cigarette smoke, Vince Gill picks the twangy opening notes to one of his new songs, the Merle Haggard-inspired "Real Mean Bottle."

Gill used the shows to rehearse the 17 songs on his upcoming album, "Next Big Thing," his first in nearly three years. Its Feb. 11 release coincides with a 15-city club tour, followed by a tour of larger venues.

Study: Television shows depict more sex, but more honestly

Sex on television is heating up, but more TV programs are including the risks and responsibilities of sexual behavior, a study released Tuesday found. The percentage of shows depicting or implying sexual intercourse rose from 10 percent two years ago to 14 percent in the 2001-02 season, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation study.

PERSONALITY PROFILE

Zac Cook
Student Body President

1. What did you have for dinner last night?
"A Subway foot-long turkey on honey oat with lettuce, tomato, green pepper onion and black olive and spicy mustard. It's the Tuesday special at the Union, and I eat that quite often."

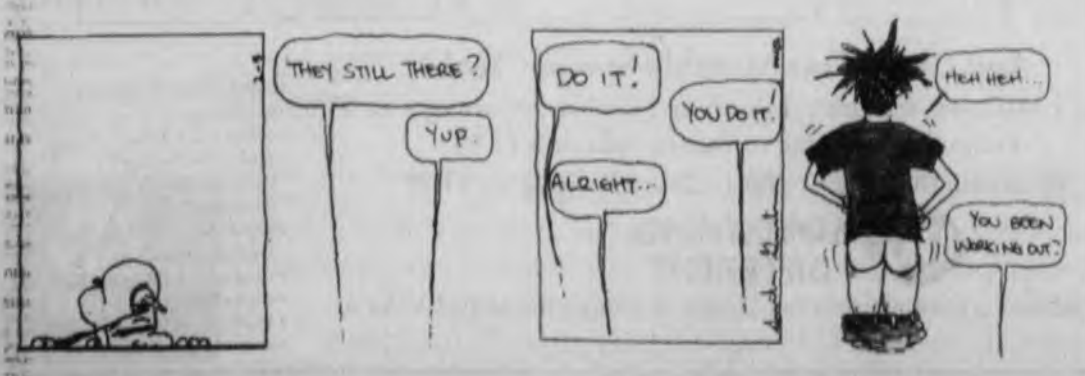
2. What is in your CD player right now (or, who is your favorite artist right now?)
"It is a burned CD I made for Mary. She's gone and it made me think of her."

3. What kind of car do you drive?
"Right now, it's a late-model black Honda. It was Mary's and she's gone."

4. What was the last movie you saw and why?
"I don't go to movies in the theater. The last one I watched would've been on the plane, and I watched 'Serving Sara.'"

5. What is your must-see TV show and why?
"I don't have one. I don't get to watch enough TV to have one. I have been intrigued by the slut-TV that Fox puts on."

6. What is your favorite place to eat out and why?
"El Caz in Manhattan. I love the food, and I like the authentic Mexican aura and the servers."



7. Who is your idol and why?
"Currently, it's David Boren because he's the president of the University of Oklahoma and authored, in 1991, the National Security Education Program."

8. What is your favorite alcoholic drink?
"Sangria. I like the fruity blend."

9. What is the craziest thing you did in college?
"I don't know. I have surely tried to eat too much of something, but I don't know."

10. Have you ever cheated on a test?
"No."

Army majors discuss travel

2 K-State men learn, work in Africa for year

By Wendy Lynn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Traveling across another continent was the experience of a lifetime for two K-State graduate students.

U.S. Army Majors Matthew Battiston and Christian Ramthun recently traveled to Africa for one year as part of the Foreign Area Officers (FAO) program. They are attending K-State as graduate students in international studies and political science. On Tuesday, they spoke to a group at the Vernon Larson International Luncheon.

FAO officers work as soldier statesmen, representing the military wherever they go. They go through three phases of training in order to prepare. First, Battiston and Ramthun traveled to Monterey, Calif. for language training in French and then they spent 2002 in Africa. For the last part of their training, the two men will be studying at K-State for the next 18 months.

After finishing their work at K-State, the men probably will be assigned back to Africa working as defense or military attachés.

Both men traveled extensively throughout Africa, experiencing different cultures, languages and people. They said they talked to anyone who would speak with them.

"We went there to learn, and that was our focus. It was not an intelligence-gathering mission," Ramthun said.

Most people Ramthun met were multilingual, so it was easy to communicate, he said. Along with French, people in Africa use tribal languages.

Battiston was stationed in Cameroon. He told the group he had assisted with various humanitarian projects throughout the area. This work gave him a great sense of accomplishment.

"I assisted with relocating a family from the jungle and building a footbridge so rural people could make it to town," Battiston said. "We also built orphanages, schools and clinics for doctors and dentists."

While studying in Africa, Battiston learned more about Cameroon's military system, intelligence and engagement.

Ramthun lived in Niger. There, he worked as an intern at the U.S. Embassy and traveled extensively. In one month, he drove more than 15,000 kilometers across the continent.

The thing he was most impressed with was how hospitable everyone was.

"People there are open, accepting and caring," Ramthun said. "I never felt threatened in any way."

Ramthun tried to focus on a different topic in each area of Africa where he traveled. Some of the subjects he learned more about were refugees, civil war and African economics. Through interviews, overland travel, seminars and working for the embassy, Ramthun learned valuable information.

Also, he was able to take a three-week class on the United Nations and how it works.

The men said they also saw the darker side of life in Africa. They recalled such horrific things as witnessing genocide in Rwanda and seeing two 15-year-old boys in Uganda who were wounded from fighting. The boys had been fighting since the age of 11.

"I have a 10-year-old son, and it is hard to fathom such a thing," Battiston said.

The Vernon Larson International Lecture series was started more than 20 years ago by its namesake. It is the longest-running luncheon program at K-State.

During the spring semester, the group meets the first Tuesday of every month. International topics are covered on a variety of issues. Next month's speaker is Myra Gordon, K-State provost for diversity and dual majors.

TRACK | Green hopes improve 10th place finish

couldn't throw, but she got unbelievably strong.

"Maybe it was a blessing in some respects."

The Big 12 Conference Indoor Championships are three weeks away, Feb. 28 to March 1, and Rovelto said Green should have a pretty good shot at repeating as conference champion.

Her nearest competitor is Becky Breisch, a sophomore from Nebraska. Breisch was more than five feet behind Green at the KSU Invitational, but she had an indoor personal best last Saturday with a mark of 53 feet, 1 1/4 inches.

Even her best leaves her more than 3 1/2 feet behind Green's 56 feet, 8 inch hurl.

"Right now in the shot there isn't anyone I think is as good as her," Rovelto said. "Becky Breisch from Nebraska is just a sophomore – a very good sophomore – and she is the only one who is even close, and this year probably the only one who could even remotely challenge Rebekah at the conference championship."

Rovelto's goals for Green don't stop at the conference level, though. He said that when he encounters people as special as her, he knows they have more in them. He said she can improve on her 10th place nationals finish last season.

"When you have people capable of competing at the national level, you expect them to compete at that level," he said. "Will she be the best girl every year? You don't know. We certainly expect her to be a major player at the national level."

BASKETBALL | Cats focus on aggressive offense

March 3, 2001, against Colorado.

"You have to be extremely tough-minded to win on the road in this league," Wooldridge said.

The trend isn't unique to the Cats, though. Six Big 12 teams are still without a road win, and three more have only one.

Last season, the visiting team won only 34 percent of the time. Fifty-eight percent of those came from the league's top three teams: Kansas, Texas and Oklahoma. The teams that filled out the bottom half won a combined four road games. Baylor and Iowa State joined the Cats in getting blanked on the road and Nebraska and Colorado each won one.

The Cats can't even count on taking any momentum out of their nail-biter against OU. Four days after hammering Texas Tech, the team lost to Colorado. A game after beating Nebraska by 24, K-State lost to Texas A&M by 13.

Just what does a Big 12 team have to do to steal a road win?

Wooldridge said it's all about hanging together and mastering the fundamentals of the game.

K-State (11-8, 2-4) at No. 12 Oklahoma State (17-2, 6-1)
When: 7 tonight
Where: Gallagher Iba Arena (13,611) — Stillwater, Okla.
Key stat: Eddie Sutton will be coaching in his 1,000th career game tonight

"A lot of things have to come together for you," he said. "You have to dictate the tempo, cash in at the free throw line and you have to take care of the ball. We talked for two days about playing together and not letting each other down. That will be a challenge."

Against Oklahoma, K-State was able to shoot consistently from the foul line. Pervis Pasco scored all his points from there. But free-throw shooting has proven to be a liability on the road. At Texas A&M, K-State shot 41.7 percent from the line and proved only slightly better against Colorado, shooting 42.3 percent.

The Cats also won the turnover battle against the Sooners. Wooldridge said that statistic may well be the key tonight, as OSU likes to play a run-and-gun type of game. He said the Cowboys feed off opponents' turnovers by using a tough defense to exploit fast-break opportunities.

Oklahoma State lines up a very fast and high-scoring team. It features three guards – Victor Williams, Tony Allen and Melvin Sanders – who average double figures in scoring.

Wooldridge said that for his team to have a chance, it will need to be aggressive on the offensive end, hope to draw fouls and try to slow down OSU's three-guard line up.

"You have to keep them in the half-court and you have to get to the foul line," he said.

"If you do that, it means you're attacking their defense. They really score off their defense. Those three perimeter guys are all scoring in double figures and playing with great confidence.

"We have to rally around one another and work together to offset runs. It all comes with mental toughness and translates into physical toughness."

developed a persona that they want the world to know them as," She said. "It is difficult to get them to show anything different from that."

Short has met this obstacle, Ashley Shelton said.

Shelton, seventh grader at Anthony Middle School, said "She taught me not to be afraid on stage."

Shelley Faerber, middle school teacher and co-director of the play, said that all the students have benefited from Short's work.

Having Short volunteer really helps with making practice more efficient, Faerber said.

"She is so energetic and connects with the kids really well," Faerber said.

Short said her energy is derived from her passion for theater and children.

"Working here has made me consider teaching theater someday," Short said. "I think anyone who has a love for kids and has a knowledge of theater would have fun here."

Jacob Wagner needed his mother's coaxing to try out for the play, but now he is glad he did.

"My mom told me to try out," he said. It's good I did because it's really fun."

Although Wagner and the other children will steal the spotlight with their performances, Short said that she is comfortable with staying behind the scenes because directing is her first love.

She said that getting to watch the children's expressions and trying to tell them what to do are the best parts of theater.

"Having the kids give you feedback and watching them develop their characters is the best part of theater," Short said.

And while all the work she puts into directing the children doesn't reward her in a paycheck, that's OK with Short because she knows the job has other benefits.

"I am blown away by these kids everyday. Their ability to articulate a scene and to be vulnerable at this age is really impressive, " Short said. "And then talking to them after practice is really amazing. Sometimes I feel younger than them."

TRADE CENTER | Professor contributes to design of memorial towers

aspects of this design that distinguishes it from the others submitted.

The first aspect is the seven-story pit called the "bathtub," the foundation of the World Trade Center that remains standing.

"We felt this was an important aspect to focus on when we came together to create our design," Arens said.

"We thought that it was a sign saying: 'A foundation of democracy was not destroyed.'"

Arens said the bathtub was an appropriate place for a memorial to be built because it is a preserved place that has the character for an important location on the site.

He said the team felt it was important to separate the memorial from the other aspects of the design.

"The separation creates one place of memory and another for the present or future," Arens said.

Another aspect that is different from the others is the "Path of the Sun." The location and design of the team's structure allows sunlight to shine directly on the site between 8:46 a.m., when the first plane struck, and 10:28 a.m., the time the second tower collapsed.

While several teams recreated the twin towers in their designs, Arens said the Libeskind team decided not to.

"We made the conscious effort not to recreate the twin towers," Arens said. "To create another set of twin towers would be looking to the past. The architecture should be more forward-thinking, positive."

Although both teams' designs included soaring structures, neither team included office space within their designs.

Arens said he thought the Libeskind design should be chosen because of urbanization it offers to city of New York.

"I think more than anything it advances the approach to urban space in lower Manhattan," he said. "To say a place that can extend seven stories below ground is unprecedented."

Arens said teams designing structures for the World Trade Center site had an important role with the city and nation moving on from this tragedy.

"We have the obligation to take this unfortunate opportunity and turn 16 acres into something positive," Arens said.

COMMISSION | Company to bring in 250 new jobs in 9 years

Auth-Florence is a third-generation family business that has been assembling and distributing mailboxes for the past 69 years.

The company began in Chicago and looks to expand with a branch in Manhattan.

"Part of the process is putting all the things together ,and we look forward to being a part of a very fine community," said Lloyd Schooley, chairman of Florence Corporation, parent to Auth-Florence Manufacturing.

"We believe we are the premiere manufacturer of mailboxes in the U.S." said Joe Norton, employee of the company.

In addition, the manufacturing company is projected to bring 250 jobs to the community within nine years, said Diane Stoddard, assistant city manager.

A search that spanned eight months, 56 communities and three countries led the company to Manhattan.

Norton said people were the primary consideration in the location decision for a family-oriented, team-oriented business.

Another contributing factor was the ability to be centrally located in the U.S. for distribution to customers.

City Commission

The following items were discussed at Tuesday night's City Commission meeting:

- First reading of a traffic ordinance for the Wal-Mart Supercenter was passed 5-0.
- Presentation on the economic development assistance for the Auth-Florence Manufacturing company.
- First reading of an ordinance to issue Internal Revenue Bonds and Tax Abatement for the Auth-Florence Manufacturing company was passed 5-0.

Missouri vs No. 5 K-State

THE WAYS THEY WIN

DEFENSE

Cats' philosophy ices opponents' shooting numbers

Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It sounds simple when Nicole Ohlde explains how K-State manages to limit its opponents to 57 points per game.

"We're just getting to spots, having our hands up and staying in passing lanes," Ohlde said.

Simple as it sounds, that philosophy has frozen opponents' shooting percentages this season. The Cats' competition has shot just 36 percent from the field and 31 percent from three-point range this season.

And it's constantly getting better.

"We're always looking to improve our defense," sophomore Chelsea Domenico said.

After allowing Iowa State to shoot 53 percent in the Cats' only conference loss, K-State put the locks on NCAA runner-up Oklahoma in Norman on Saturday.

"We stepped up a bunch during the Oklahoma game and regained our confidence," Domenico said.

COACHING

Patterson's vision key to bringing Wildcats together

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Take away Nicole Ohlde's presence in the post. Forget about Kendra Wecker's athletic ability. Remove Laurie Koehn's skills from the 3-point line, and one element remains for K-State's women's basketball team.

And it might be the most important part.

Players will tell you Deb Patterson is the glue that holds the Wildcats together.

They'll say her perch on the K-State bench is the reason the Wildcats are off to the best start in school history.

"Coach P is incredible, and she does so much for this team," sophomore Nicole Ohlde said. "You can tell that she cares about each person individually as well as trying to make them better."

But it doesn't end on the court.

"Coach P is passionate in everything," sophomore Brie Madden said. "She's just a wonderful woman, and everyone around her knows it. It's almost blinding how helpful

3-POINT SHOOTING

Players step up to fill hole left by 3-point shooter

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Talk about K-State's capabilities from beyond the three-point line, and you have to mention Laurie Koehn.

Koehn, even after sitting out four of the Wildcats' last five games, leads the conference with 49 treys this season.

But the Wildcats probably won't have Koehn when the Missouri Tigers come to town tonight.

So K-State's points from behind the arc are going to have to come from somebody else.

Fortunately, the Cats have other players who can shoot. Sophomores Kendra Wecker, Megan Mahoney and Chelsea Domenico all rank in the top ten in the Big 12 in three-pointers.

Wecker and Mahoney have 34 treys, while Domenico has chipped in 22.

Junior forward Amy Dutmer has added 10 three-pointers on the year as well.

REBOUNDING

Cats rank high in rebounding, look to battle on glass

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At 40 per game, K-State claims the third-best rebounding mark in the conference.

The Wildcats have been dominant on the boards this season, out-rebounding 16 of their 21 opponents.

Junior All-America candidate Nicole Ohlde said K-State will need to continue to excel in rebounding tonight.

"Missouri is a great rebounding team that goes to the offensive boards really hard," Ohlde said. "We have to come in and make sure we put a body on someone.

Defensive rebounding has been a foundation for the Wildcats this year.

At 27.4 defensive rebounds per game, K-State ranks second in the Big 12.

Sophomore center Brie Madden, averaging 4.8 boards per outing, said the physical play of the Big 12 demands that teams bring rebounding effort night in and night out.

"When you play in such an athletic league

Rejuvenated Wildcats will topple Tigers in cat fight

A two-head Tiger squad has shown up in Columbia this season.

Missouri has shown it can beat Big 12 teams with wins over Oklahoma State, Nebraska, Colorado, and on Jan. 19, the Tigers also beat Iowa State.

BEN FEHR

But Mizzou has struggled at times this season, as well. Conference losses to Baylor, Texas and Texas Tech likely didn't cause panic through Missouri's program, but losses to SMU, Louisiana-Lafayette, Austin Peay, Illinois and Iowa show just how ugly that other head is.

Still, the win over Iowa State should give Missouri some confidence coming into Manhattan tonight. After all, that's an Iowa State squad that beat No. 3 K-State last Wednesday.

Nevertheless, the Tigers will come to Manhattan as heavy undercats.

K-State followed its loss to ISU by blasting the defending Big 12 champion and NCAA runner-up Oklahoma Sooners 74-45 on Saturday.

The Wildcats are also riding a 16-game winning streak in Bramlage Coliseum.

In that stretch, K-State is averaging 80.6 points per game to its opponent's 55.5.

K-State's last win in the Purple Palace came over Texas on Jan. 25 to deny the Longhorns their best start ever in the Big 12.

That Wildcat victory was over a Texas squad that demolished Missouri 70-59 at Home winning streak on the line tonight

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Deb Patterson calls it "holding home court."

K-State's opponents just call it tough.

While Bramlage Coliseum has been a haven for the Wildcats this season, for their competition, it's been hell.

Undefeated at home this season, K-State again will welcome an opponent to Bramlage at 7 tonight, and again the visitors will face a double-digit Wildcat home winning streak.

"Being at home allows the student-athlete to be in their comfort zone," Patterson said. "They come to the game and are surrounded by family, friends and fellow students who are absolutely crazy about them."

Missouri (10-8, 4-3) will be the opponent Wednesday night, and if the crowd holds true to form, the Tigers should find out early how rowdy those fans can get.

"We definitely want to protect home court," sophomore Megan Mahoney said. "We want people coming in here knowing this is going to be a tough place to play. We just have to establish that every night by going out and playing hard."

Against K-State (19-2, 6-1), a tough, physical game will be Mizzou's mission too.

The Tigers' primary offensive threats are Evan Unrau (15.1 ppg, 8.3 rpg) and Kerensa Barr (11.9 ppg, 4.0 rpg).

"Kerensa creates a real challenge for our on-ball defender as well as our team defense," Patterson said. "You have to extend out and defend her, yet if you overextend she is – and the Big 12 has unbelievable athletes – you have to bring the rebounding game," Madden said.

"You have to keep teams from getting second shots, and you have to get second shots. You have to have a nose for the ball, and it's really important for everyone to get involved."

Ohlde said gaining the edge on the glass is important.

"Our rebounding is strong when we commit to going out there and doing it," she said. "It comes putting the work in to go get some rebounds."

DEFENSE | Wildcats allow minimal scoring from opponents

The Sooners hit just 31 percent of their shots and committed 16 turnovers.

Good defense has been a trend this season for K-State.

In conference games, the Wildcats rank second in scoring defense, 55.3 points per game, third in field goal percentage defense, at 35.8 percent, and sixth in three-point field goal percentage defense, at 32.3 percent.

"This team works together so well," sophomore Brie Madden said. "We like to pride ourselves on our work ethic and our attitude."

COACH | Patterson's experience at K-State successful in past, present and caring she really is."

Her success – a 2001-02 Sweet 16 showing and plenty of anticipation for this March's postseason jaunt – is the result of a simple approach.

"She really wants you to grow in your relationships," Madden said.

The same is true of assistants Kristin Becker, Kamie Ethridge and Sue Serafini, who have bought into Patterson's plan for success and are reaping the awards of their efforts.

"They are always looking at good recruits, and they have a vision," Ohlde said. "With that vision, they truly believe they can make it happen."

SHOOTING | Shooters emerge to maintain Cats' 3-point potency

But Mahoney said K-State isn't looking to win games from the outside.

"We'll get our threes in our offense," Mahoney said. "We're not just looking to go out there and bomb them all over the place. We'll get them in the flow of our offense."

Executing within the offense has allowed K-State to maintain a good percentage from the outside, however.

The Wildcats lead the conference in three-point field goals at 39.9 percent.

Wecker said the Wildcats are dangerous with or without Koehn in the lineup.

"Our offense is good enough, and we have enough players who are able to knock down shots," Wecker said. "You get Chelsea coming in and hitting three or four threes.

"And with Amy coming in knocking down two or three and getting some rebounds, we're pretty tough. We're high-percentage when we come to play."

Mahoney steps up to help team through Koehn's injury

Sophomore guard's performance shows dedication to her role

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Injuries hurt.

Team chemistry, depth and momentum are all affected by them.

Players inevitably have to step up, and leadership is forged.

Because of floor general Laurie Koehn's persisting ankle injury, one women's basketball player taking her game to the next level is sophomore guard Megan Mahoney.

"Injuries happen in this league," said Mahoney. "We definitely want to get Laurie back, but we're confident in who we are."

Who they are is a top-5 team that dismantled then-No. 18 Oklahoma in Norman on Saturday. In that contest, Mahoney scored 15 points on 6-of-8 shooting, pulled down nine rebounds, and dished out five assists.

Leadership potential was being realized.

In an upset loss at Iowa State, Mahoney tied a career high with 22 points.

In that game, foul trouble plagued the Wildcats, forcing Mahoney and junior Nicole Ohlde to carry the load.

"It's important to have players out of foul trouble, but at the same time, that's going to happen," said Mahoney. "The players on the floor need to step up. It can be a big weight if someone's sitting on the bench, but at the same time, we have to get out there and fill our roles."

For much of her career, Mahoney's role has been to find the open player. Already 10th on K-State's career assists list, she has continued to average more than five assists per game in Koehn's absence.

That's in addition to looking for the open shot more herself.

"With Laurie out, there's however many points a game she averages that we have to compensate for," said Mahoney. "If I can get more open shots, maybe try to knock those down, I can help with that aspect."

In Koehn's absence, Mahoney's scoring average has increased, her field goal percentage has risen, and her leadership skills have begun to emerge.

The intangibles are what make a leader.

It's hustle.

"We have great post rebounders, but we're very good on the perimeter, too," said sophomore center Brie Madden. "Like Megan – she'll crash in from anywhere."

As Mahoney indicated, her role on the floor has become more important. Rather than lead by example, like Nicole Ohlde and Kendra Wecker, Mahoney has felt the need to speak up.

"I'm trying to become more of a vocal leader out there, just talking and communicating," Mahoney said.

"We're all just trying to contribute more."

20/20

K-State is one win shy of the program's second-straight 20-win season and 16th in school history.

100,000-fan mark could be topped

With 2,788 fans at tonight's game, K-State would become the fourth school in Division 1 to reach the 100,000-fan mark in 2002-03.

The Cats are averaging 7,478 fans per outing at Bramlage Coliseum this season.

Wecker could reach milestone

Sophomore Kendra Wecker needs 15 points to become K-State's 29th 1,000-point scorer.

With 17, Wecker would move to 28th on the school's all-time high scorers list.

Ohlde piling up double-doubles

Junior standout Nicole Ohlde booked her 28th career double-double against Oklahoma on Saturday, with 12 points and 12 rebounds.

The center is K-State's career leader in the category and ranks seventh on the single-season list. Ohlde also ranks sixth on the Big 12 career list.

Wecker a top choice in poll for Wade trophy

Forward claims nearly 30 percent of ESPN votes

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Diana Taurasi versus Kendra Wecker.

A head-to-head battle between two of the top players in the country.

Fans had better stop drooling, because this battle isn't being contested on the hardwood – at least not yet.

ESPN.com is conducting a poll to determine the top candidate for the Wade Trophy, considered by many to be the Heisman Trophy of women's basketball. Taurasi and Wecker continue to lead the balloting, carrying 40.3 percent and 29.0 percent of the votes, respectively.

Although the notoriety is flattering, Wecker finds her status hard to believe.

"I was excited, but I don't feel like I should be in that list right now," the sophomore forward said.

"I think there's a lot in the game that I still need to work on, being more fundamental with my handle and just being smarter with things."

When asked whether she was the third best player in the nation, behind Taurasi and Duke's Alana Beard, Wecker was speechless.

Actually, she laughed.

"I feel grateful to be on that list," she said. "But I think there's so much more that I still need to do."

But a head-to-head comparison with Taurasi shows that Wecker deserves all the attention she's getting.

Both players lead their teams in scoring, Wecker with 20.4 ppg and Taurasi with 17.8 ppg. Both have scored more than 30 points in a game this season. Both players grab more than six rebounds per game. Both players are leaders.

That is where their styles differ, though.

"Kendra doesn't really say a lot on the court vocally, but I think her game, intensity and motivation speak for her," guard Chelsea Domenico said.

"When she comes out hitting her shots, and just how aggressive she comes out playing, she definitely picks it up for the rest of the team – I know she gets me pumped."

By contrast, Connecticut's Diana Taurasi is about as vocal as one gets.

As the only returning starter from a 39-0 NCAA championship team, she has had to be.

Wecker may be one of Taurasi's biggest fans.

"Diana would throw my shot in the fifth row," said Wecker.

"I thought, besides (former UConn All-American) Sue Bird, Diana was probably the best player in the country last year."

Respect is something both players have received plenty of during their careers. Trophy cases and awards lists are brimming with praise.

Taurasi is a KODAK and second-team All-American. She is once again a finalist for the Naismith Player of the Year and has her team ranked No. 1 in the nation, despite its lack of experience.

Wecker, meanwhile, has emerged as one of the top players in the country despite being under most analysts' preseason radar.

Kendra Wecker looks to pass to Nichole Ohlde during the first half of their 74-69 victory over Oklahoma. The Wildcats take on Missouri tonight at Bramlage Coliseum.

Matt Elliott
COLLEGIAN

In awards, as on the court, she quietly produces.

She has twice been named Player of the Week in what is arguably the most competitive conference in the country, amassing eight double-doubles.

Dating back to last season, Wecker has booked double-digit point totals in 32 consecutive games.

"She just has her ways," said Domenico.

"On the court, she may not speak a lot, but definitely her game and how great she is as a player speak for her."

FIGHT | Tigers come to Manhattan as 'undercats'

Columbia on Jan. 11.

And while Missouri rebounded from the Texas loss by trashing Iowa State in Ames, K-State followed its win over Longhorns by stumbling against the Cyclones.

However, there were some key differences in the K-State team that beat Texas and the Wildcats who fell to Iowa State.

For one, Laurie Koehn played against Texas. The sophomore long-range specialist banged in 11 points against Jody Conradt's club.

Koehn played just five minutes and scored zero against Iowa State due to a nagging ankle injury that has benched K-State's most dangerous outside threat for four of the Cats' last five games.

Second, the Wildcats had Kendra Wecker against Texas. K-State's sophomore forward scored 17 of her game-high 27 points in the first half against the No. 18 Longhorns.

Against Iowa State, the only thing Wecker managed in the first half was three fouls, though two of those calls came from an official who may well have been dreaming of halftime cotton candy breaks and breakthroughs in eye care technology.

Koehn is still a question mark for the Missouri game.

But Wecker walked an undoubtedly inexperienced Oklahoma team for 24 points and nine rebounds on Saturday.

And now the only question regarding the Wildcat sophomore is how many points she will score before the Tiger defending her bursts into tears of frustration.

K-State will have the added incentive of playing for a win that would move the Cats into a three-way tie with conference co-leaders Texas and Texas Tech.

Can Missouri beat K-State on Saturday? Sure.

But there's a better possibility of a Tiger being born with two heads.

tremendous off the dribble and attacking the basket."

Off the dribble, Barr's primary target when she intends to dish is usually Unrau.

"Evan is a great player," Patterson said. "Her size gives her an advantage over most small forward defenders. She is big, strong and versatile."

The key to the matchup is finding ways to cap the Tigers' opportunities.

"They're two great players for Missouri, and we're just going to have to play team defense and contain," Mahoney said.

And even though the game is on K-State's home floor, Patterson said her team isn't relying on the streak to guarantee a win.

"We're fortunate to have tremendous fan support," Patterson said.

"That can provide an additional challenge to every opponent that walks in the door. Regardless of where we play, though, it still comes down to being ready to play at the highest level we're capable of."

Powell presents evidence

Tape recordings, satellite photos among documentation presented to U.N. Wednesday

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS – Secretary of State Colin Powell, methodically making his case that Iraq has defied all demands that it disarm, presented tape recordings, satellite photos and informants' statements Wednesday that he said constituted irrefutable and undeniable evidence that Saddam Hussein was concealing weapons of mass destruction.

"Clearly, Saddam Hussein and his regime will stop at nothing until something stops him," Powell told a skeptical U.N. Security Council. He said Baghdad's denials represented a web of lies.

Colin Powell
SECRETARY OF STATE

Three months after Iraq pledged that it would disarm, Powell presented his evidence in an appearance that was televised around the world. The Council members – joined by Iraq's U.N. ambassador – sat around a large circular table with Powell and listened attentively.

"The pronouncements that Mr. Powell made in his presentation are utterly unrelated to the truth," countered Mohammed Al-Douri. "There are incorrect allegations, unnamed sources, unknown sources."

He also suggested that audio tapes played to the Council by Powell were not genuine.

Powell stared icily at Al-Douri during the Iraqi's rebuttal.

Of the 15 Council members, only the United States and Britain have voiced support for forcibly disarming Saddam, but the Bush administration is counting on Spain and Bulgaria, among others, to be part of any coalition against Iraq.

The administration's next step is to decide whether allies are willing to support a resolution specifically authorizing force against Iraq, a senior official said. The key is France, this official

Thursdays mark beginning of weekend

From Aggieville to fraternities and house parties, Thursday nights have become a popular night for students to party, sometimes with consequences the next morning.

Going out on Thursdays offers a way for students to start the weekend early after an entire week of studying, students said.

Dustin Meritt, junior in park resource interpretation, described going out on Thursdays as a way to build up to the weekend.

He said that with the approach of the weekend, Thursdays are a good night to go out.

"All you have to think is, 'There's only one day left,' and you gotta push right through," Meritt said.

Jamie Coones, senior in golf course management, said he agreed.

"One reason I go out on Thursday is, it just kind of gets you prepared for the weekend," Coones said.

Dana Van Daele, senior in apparel marketing and design, said one advantage of going to the bars on Thursday is the variety of deals they offer

Long weekends becoming commonplace for students

For one house of guys at K-State, weekends are what make the week.

Roommates Matt McLain, junior in golf course management; Jared Moreland, senior in architectural engineering; Stevie Richardson, senior in marketing; and Doug McGrath, senior in construction science, like to go out together to celebrate the end of the week, and last week was no exception.

On Thursday, the group started out with a game of Trivial Pursuit – and beer.

Later, they went to Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon, along with friends from the Kansas City metro area. They then migrated to Aggie Station, where they stayed until closing time.

"I got really drunk Thursday, so I didn't even go out Friday because I was messed up still," McLain said.

Friday night started with bowling at the K-State Student Union – and more beer.

Around midnight, the group went to Aggie Station for some drinks and later to O'Malley's Alley, where a fight broke out with one of their friends.

He was arrested and taken into custody, so the men made a trip to the Riley County Police Department jail to pay his $75 bail.

On Saturday, they took a road trip to Junction City, where they played golf at Rolling Meadows – and drank beer.

At around 6 p.m., they went back to Aggie Station, where Richardson was bartending. They stayed until around 10 p.m. and then went home. Some of the roommates left

SPOTLIGHT | THEATER AWARD

K-State senior receives playwriting award from American College Theatre Festival

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State student has been honored for a play he wrote that was produced on campus last spring

Nathan Jackson, senior in theater, received recognition for his play, "The Mancherios."

Kate Anderson, director of theater, said Jackson's play was one of six that were selected for competition in January at the University of Northern Iowa for the American College Theatre Festival.

"It was a wonderful honor for Nathan to receive the award," she said.

Jackson said he was shocked when he heard he had won.

"We were at the festival at an awards ceremony," he said. "I thought we were just being recognized, and then they told me I had won the award."

Jackson said his play was given special recognition with the National Lorraine Hansberry Playwriting Award at the festival. He received a cash prize of $2,500 and will attend the National ACTS Festival in Washington.

Jackson also said he would be able to attend the National Playwrights Convention this summer in Connecticut.

"There is also the possibility that my play will be published," he said.

Jackson said he has been working on the play for a year and that a large influence in his writing was the recent death of his father

"After my father passed, it really sparked my writing to get out all I was thinking at the time and finish the play," he said.

The plot of "The Mancherios" is about family ties, Anderson said. Jackson described it as a family getting through problems without a mother's presence.

"It is basically a family of two brothers and a father," Jackson said. "The mother has passed away, and this story is about how the family is trying to stay together through it all."

"The Mancherios" was the first play Jackson has written, but he said he plans to write more in the future.

Jackson said he gets inspiration from several different places.

"I admire August Wilson (playwright activist) – his work ethic," he said. "But most of my inspiration has come from my mother and father."

Jackson said the best thing about working with this play was how much the faculty at K-State helped in its production.

Jackson said his plans for the future are up in the air right now.

"After I attend the conferences, I will just see where I am," he said. "Right now, it's between grad school and just actually testing out the playwriting business."

BEST BETS | FOR THIS WEEKEND

1 | BRING ON THE HAWKS Sure, K-State hasn't beaten KU in basketball since Methuselah was a pup, but Cat fans are optimists. Coach Jim Wooldridge and his crew nearly knocked off the Sooners last Saturday. Cheer them on as they finish the job against Roy's boys. Gametime is 12:45 p.m. Saturday. Have your KU insults ready beforehand.

Coach Roy Williams and the Kansas Jayhawks visit Bramlage Coliseum Saturday for what has become a lopsided series. The Cats look for their first win over KU since January 17, 1994.

2 | AGGIEVILLE There's only one place to go after the big win, and it's not the library. Hit the 'Ville and celebrate the big win. Or if the Cats drop the ball against KU, drop a few dollars on beverages guaranteed to erase any bad memory. Win or lose, everyone except KU fans has fun in Aggieville.

FROGZ, a production featuring music, dance and costumes, will bring a little imagination to the dreary Manhattan winter. There is just one showing, at 7 p.m., Sunday, at McCain Auditorium.

3 | "THE RING" Some people called it the scariest movie since "The Exorcist." In this remake of an earlier Japanese film, people watch a video and then die. This version also has crazy horses, creepy old guys and a little girl with no facial expressions. The first showing is 7 p.m. Friday, in Forum Hall. Extra clean underwear is not provided.

4 | FROGZ This ain't your high school's drama production. Only "FROGZ" features dancers in masks resembling penguins, crocodiles, and frogs dancing around. The show starts at 7 p.m., Sunday, in McCain Auditorium. Student tickets are $7.50.

5 | YARD PARTY Weather is in the mind of the beholder. Break out the Hawaiian shirts, sunglasses and pina colada's and tell the groundhog he can shove six more weeks of winter back down his hole. If it's too cold, try cocoa and peppermint schnapps.

Brownback speaks on Iraq

Senator agrees with Powell

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senator Sam Brownback, R-Kan., said at a news conference Wednesday that he supported Secretary of State Colin Powell's opinion of Iraq's compliance with weapon inspections.

Powell reported to the United Nations Security Council on Wednesday that Iraq was not in material compliance with weapon inspections and that the country was defiantly hiding weapons from inspectors, Brownback said.

Sam Brownback
SENATOR
R-KANSAS

Although Powell said he classifies himself as a reluctant warrior, he said he is completely convinced the world is going to have to join together and remove weapons from Saddam Hussein, Brownback said.

"This is a difficult and trying time for our country," he said.

"After 9/11, with terrorists attacking us, we can't allow a place in the world that will house terrorists and produce weapons of mass destruction to use against us."

Brownback also offered his condolences to the families of the crew of space shuttle Columbia.

"My prayers and the prayers of the nation are with the family members," he said. "The lost heroes will be greatly missed."

Brownback said he will chair the U.S. Senate subcommittee on Science, Space and Technology, and will conduct hearings to find out what went wrong with Columbia, why it went wrong and how it will be fixed.

Brownback said he expects those hearings to begin next week.

He also said he wants to pair the Senate subcommittee he chairs with the House of Representatives subcommittee to discuss the overall future of space flight.

"We want to know where we are going, how do we get there, and how do we get there safely," he said. "I am committed to manned space flight. This is something we should do – it's a vision of our country."

Brownback went on to comment on the budget President Bush recently announced.

He said he agreed that the United States needs to be secure and there needs to be a boost in the economy.

"When you have a growing economy, you grow out of deficit," he said. "That's what we've got to get moving again – that's what we need for Kansas as well."

One way to get Kansas' economy moving again would be through financial relief to farmers in drought disaster areas.

Brownback said the drought disaster aid package should pass in the House and Senate next week.

"We are dry across the state," he said. "We need rain, and we need financial assistance to help us from last year's drought."

If Congress maintains the aid package that the Senate passed, Brownback said, they'll be able to quickly get funds to farmers who need them.

North Korea reactivates nuclear facilities

Washington officials demand reverse action

By Jae-Suk Yoo
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEOUL, South Korea – North Korea said Wednesday it has reactivated its nuclear facilities, a surprise announcement that raised questions about whether it was trying to take advantage of Washington's preoccupation with Iraq to ratchet up pressure in its own standoff with the United States.

In Washington, the State Department said that if the announcement was true, this would be a very serious development. It demanded the North "reverse this action ... North Korea must visibly, verifiably and irreversibly dismantle its nuclear weapons program."

A North Korean spokesman announced the reactivation, deepening the crisis over Pyongyang's nuclear ambitions, just before Secretary of State Colin Powell spoke at the U.N. Security Council, presenting the U.S. case against Iraq.

The North said the reactivated facilities would, for the present stage, be used only to produce electricity – but the United States says the facilities can produce nuclear weapons within months.

Even as it presses toward war with Iraq over alleged hidden weapons of mass destruction, the United States has insisted it wants a peaceful solution in its standoff with North Korea.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer discounted that Pyongyang was timing the issue with Iraq developments.

"North Korea has a history of doing things like they did in the '90s, outside of the context of Iraq," he said.

The North's announcement came hours after South Korea took a new step in its policy of trying to ease tensions by pursuing reconciliation with the isolated communist regime. Earlier Wednesday, the South opened a road across the heavily fortified border for the first time in more than half a century.

Pyongyang wants direct talks with Washington, something U.S. officials have resisted. Analysts say North Korea, which often accuses the United States of plotting to invade it, fears Washington will turn up pressure on it if a war against Iraq is successful.

The North might hope that heightening the standoff at a time when Washington is trying to concentrate on Iraq could prompt the United States to make concessions.

The Pentagon is considering bolstering U.S. forces in the region to deter the North from any provocations during an Iraq war. Washington says it has no plans to invade North Korea.

The United States is pressing for the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency to refer the issue to the Security Council – which likely would impose punitive sanctions on the North.

At the International Atomic Energy Agency, spokeswoman Melissa Fleming had no immediate comment on the report from the North.

The Vienna-based IAEA's 35-nation board of governors will meet next Wednesday on the standoff and is almost certain to send the dispute to the Security Council.

The North Korean spokesman said his country had restarted the nuclear facilities and was "putting (their) operation ... for the production of electricity on a normal footing."

Activity at the facilities will be only for peaceful purposes, including the production of electricity, at the present stage, said the spokesman in remarks carried by the official KCNA news agency.

U.S. officials say the amount of electricity that North Korea can produce at its 5-megawatt nuclear reactor is negligible.

The nuclear complex at Yongbyon, north of Pyongyang, includes a building that stores 8,000 spent fuel rods and a reprocessing laboratory, where the North Koreans can extract weapons-grade plutonium from those fuel rods.

The North Korean spokesman did not refer to specific facilities.

Earlier Wednesday, South Korea opened the first cross-border land route with the North since the peninsula was divided in 1945 and called for more reconciliation efforts.

South Korea believes expanded exchanges with North Korea can encourage a peaceful resolution to the standoff.

Municipal Court moves locations

Changing needs of city, increase in misdemeanors among reasons for move

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Municipal Court reopened Monday in a new location, and with the move came an increase in the amount of misdemeanor trials the court will handle.

The court vacated its home in the Colony Square complex during the weekend, moving its equipment and fixtures to 610 Colorado St.

The move was initiated more than a year ago due to changing needs of both the city and M.B.I. Inc., owners of the Colony Square building.

City Attorney William Frost said that at that time, the proprietors asked the city to find new facilities to house its Municipal Court.

"Although they didn't terminate our lease, they let us know that they were going to reserve the right to do so on 30 days notice," Frost said.

Municipal Judge Pat Caffey said the situation was problematic because the court had always intended Colony Square to be a temporary location, even though it remained there for more than 13 years.

"Basically, we were on a month-to-month tenancy," Caffey said.

Frost said the city shared an interest in finding a new spot because the space available at Colony Square seemed inadequate for its case load.

In addition, the recent ordinances that gave the Municipal Court jurisdiction to handle another level of misdemeanors made the larger space a necessity.

Traditionally, the Municipal Court had held arraignments for violations of city ordinances such as traffic and parking regulations, fire codes and some misdemeanors.

However, the court now will handle misdemeanor charges of first offense for the possession of marijuana.

The court also will oversee more cases involving worthless checks, theft and criminal damage to property. The limits of jurisdiction now are increased from $150 to $500 for those charges.

The city ordinance giving expanded jurisdiction to the Municipal Court came at the request of the Riley County Police Department and the Riley County Attorney's office.

"They asked that the city undertake the prosecution of these cases in Municipal Court to free up the county attorney's office so they could focus their efforts on more serious cases," Frost said.

The city decided the best location to accommodate the additional cases and provide a permanent home was the former Riley County Law Enforcement Center.

The building was reverted to the city's control when the police department moved to its new facility.

The Colorado facility required about $450,000 in renovations to make it usable for the court. The city decided to pay for the project with existing funds over a period of four years, the first project to do so rather than being bonded.

Bernie Hayen, director of finance, said that although it cost money to move the court, the city ultimately will be saving money by not having to continually rent space. While at the Colony Square location, the city was paying about $27,000 a month in rent.

The additional space of the renovated building has allowed more offices for the city's legal staff. The city also has hired another clerical worker to help with the increase in cases.

The court also will have an extra half-day of court sessions on Wednesdays to supplement their full-day sessions on Tuesdays and Thursdays.

"Ultimately, the people are more important than the facility," Caffey said, "but I think the new facility will be more conducive for a timely administration of justice."

OPINION

TO THE POINT

United Nations must continue with inspections

At his presentation to the U.N. Security Council on Wednesday morning, Secretary of State Colin Powell tried to show the "smoking gun." Instead, his evidence against Saddam Hussein only raises more questions.

First and foremost: why haven't U.N. weapons inspectors located these offensive weapons and materials if the U.S. has evidence of them, as well as their locations?

Could the U.S. be suddenly providing this information to further its agenda? Why wasn't this information released sooner?

The only way to ensure an unbiased collection of evidence is with the continued efforts of U.N. inspectors.

In his report to the Security Council, Chief Inspector Hans Blix knew his job wasn't done and asked for more time. Powell's newly released information doesn't answer the questions and missing parts of the inspectors' reports.

China, Russia and France are right in holding out for solid proof, unlike war-hungry America and Britain.

War brings serious consequences. Before the U.S. commits to the possible deaths of innocent Iraqi civilians and the loss of American soldiers, there must be concrete evidence of Iraqi threats, collected by an unbiased source.

Hey, Collegian, let's find four conservative students and pretend they are diverse because they have different majors and waste an entire page asking them about sex. Find some real people.

Paul Restivo: what a bad, bad stereotype of black males. Oh yeah, and the picture didn't go.

I put my roommate's toothbrush in my butt yesterday.

All I want to say is to Paul Restivo — your article is very ignorant, and it doesn't describe black people very well at all. Thanks.

To Paul, if you knew what "I'm gonna go home and eat it like a vulture" meant, I don't think you would print it in your newspaper article.

You know my policy: no fatties.

I know psoriasis sufferers that are more comfortable in their skin than Al Gore is.

Does anyone know why there's not a Hooters in Manhattan?

Get ready for the pain woman. Get ready for the pain train! Woo-hoo!

Join the Army. See the world. Meet new people. Then kill them.

I'm sorry, but when did the Collegian's editorial board become an expert in economics?

Does Paul Restivo write columns just to be offensive? Because that's the only thing they're good at, offending people.

WORN WORDS

Unoriginal clichés make for tasteless vocabulary, ineffective emphasis

LAYTON EHMKE

If you want people to stop listening to whatever you happen to be saying, a sure-fire way of meeting that end is to spout off a few clichés while trying to promote sincerity in the same breath.

So here are a few of the most pointless, sickly ineffective and sour-tasting phrases to avoid in 2003, which you probably already know about if you've been listening to people yak.

In regards to chatting with people who claim to have something to accomplish, they usually start quoting sayings that become so overused and petty, that nobody really knows or really cares what they mean anymore. The second I hear severely overused rhetoric, I tune out.

For instance, when someone tells me they plan to "think outside the box," it usually follows that I think to myself, "Hmmm, oxyfreakin'moron indeed."

To think outside the box by definition means to reach a goal by rerouting the usual intellectual effort. Quoting cliché is like playing the piano with your hands bound behind your back. You'll probably end up banging the keys with your supra orbital crest, which may sound like fun to many of you Ritalin-popping Fourum dialers, but I don't suggest it for a route to productivity.

How about when people tell you the famous rhetoric "I need closure"? Man, I can't stand this crap anymore. Everytime anything ends, somebody's got to come out screaming for "closure." Realistically, what the hell is anyone else supposed to do about your "closure?" You need "closure"? Go get it. While you're out there getting your "closure," I'll be rolling right along with life because there is fairly good evidence that points to the general belief that the world really will keep on turning whether you get "closure" or not.

Were you ever part of a group project where there was a member who promised you their effort to "compromise and synergize?" This one almost hurts to repeat. It sounds like something a complete wuss would come up with. What in Christ's name does synergize mean? Does it have anything to do with Jazzercize? If so, count me out. Way out.

Here's one that has never, since the dawn of time, made a damn bit of sense, and it is, in fact, "since the dawn of time." Can anybody tell me when exactly the "dawn of time" was? C'mon, people. The dawn of what time? This makes about as much sense as girls going on tuna diets.

Perhaps people could instead say, "since the dawn of today" or "since dawn," both of which are references to real time.

The last cliché worth mentioning is one I've heard on a nearly daily basis for about seven years, and I sorely hope people eliminate it from their repertoires and introductions to papers they write in school.

When people throw around the phrase "for shits and giggles," we must question its origin. What kind of a person indeed giggles during fecal evacuation? I can only think of limited cases where it would apply, and none of them are pleasant.

One such situation that would lend itself to giggling during a bowel movement would be if a demented individual were in fact to exercise his or her bowels with devious intent. Let's say you were to acquire someone's lunch box prior to their taking a road trip. Would it be funny if the owner of the lunch box was coasting down the interstate expecting to find a ham sandwich or cold beverage and instead found the product of that movement? Possibly. But still, I wish people would stop using the phrase in everyday lingo.

The last bit of rhetoric that sickens me is the most common occurrence of mallspeak. The next time I hear someone string 10 "likes" into a sentence, it better, like, like, totally, like, be the last. Theriouthly.

Those serious about religion should prove it when practicing own faith

ZACH HAUSER

Four out of five dentists agree, vanity is in and the number of men wanting to experience the magic of a stiletto high-heel is on steep decline. But through all this, religion somehow perseveres.

Those wanting to broach religion in a discussion always begin with a probing question like, "So, are you religious?" And more often than not, the "yes" response always has something to do with, "Well, I go to church." I often want to respond, "Yeah, I usually go to my house."

It seems it's not enough to simply believe in something anymore. If you're serious about believing in something, you had better attend meetings, practice regularly and donate money or else you won't be a good believer. This is where organized religion has its conflict of interest and where Jesse Jackson cashes in the most collection plates.

People too often fall victim to their insatiable lust for a purpose in life. And instead of finding their path on their own, they turn to others to show them a cause in which they can get involved.

What makes attending church being religious? Do I have to dress up, pay homage with song, kneel and stand repeatedly at someone's beck and call and still socialize over coffee afterwards to affirm my faith? Going to church has gotten more and more about everything besides your faith. Church: the social outing where you dress your best and feel like you're a worthwhile person afterwards.

Religion, especially as of late, has been motivation behind everything from suicide bombings to red meat. So next time I treat myself to a hamburger or candy bar during Lent, I should confess this horrific sin to a church representative who tells me that if I admit it was wrong and say a few words of redemption, I'll be OK.

Is this really what faith and believing should be about? No.

Unfortunately, these questions seldom are addressed publicly. Just imagine what would happen if we didn't question and keep our government accountable to the people they represent, every American. So why is it so outrageous that we stop being so complacent and unquestioning in our faith?

If parents want to raise their kids in an environment in which morals and values are taught through religion, more power to them. But why not also teach your children to question what they believe and never be satisfied with the notion of believing in something just based on the convictions of others? Teaching your kid is one thing, but programming them is quite another.

Religion these days means big controversy and big business. Too bad people aren't as big on practicing their faith as they are on telling people why others are wrong.

Religion has been reduced to a middle-school popularity contest with religious leaders as the cool kids. Lording over their followers, gossiping, being petty and dramatizing everything in an effort to do nothing but stay in control, going nowhere, but having everything and everyone in the palm of their hand next to the unleavened bread and cup of Soma.

Researchers work with cell replication

Findings might prove to be cure for Parkinson's, other diseases

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State researchers may have found a way to combat cell-degenerative diseases, including Parkinson's Disease and Muscular Dystrophy.

Researchers in the College of Veterinary Medicine, along with those in the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, have been working for quite some time now on a new form of stem cell research.

Cells from Wharton's jelly, the matrix of the umbilical cord, have been discovered to replicate other cells.

"We had been working with stromal bone marrow, which are adult stem cells, but we were interested in finding alternate sources of postnatal stem cells," said Dr. Deryl Troyer, professor of anatomy and physiology.

They obtained some pig umbilical cords and began experimenting with them by putting them into culture, he said.

Very quickly, primitive-looking cells began migrating from them.

"One of the intriguing early observations was that a few of them resembled neurons. We thought, 'Of course, that can't be true,' but then we started to add things to the cells to try and induce them to become neurons," Troyer said.

Mark Weiss, associate professor of anatomy and physiology, said he was shocked as well to see the similarities between neurons and the experimental cells.

"I looked at them and said, 'Oh my goodness, these look like neurons,'" Weiss said.

They conducted neural marker tests and found that the cells did, in fact, change into neurons quite easily, he said.

The fact that the cells can so easily become neurons means many things, Troyer said.

Not only could it be a possible cure for Parkinson's Disease, but for other neuro-degenerative diseases, as well as rehabilitation for victims of head trauma and stroke.

"We're interested in learning if these cells are therapeutic," Weiss said. "We want to know not only if we can use them to treat diseases, but for other things as well – possibly agriculture.

We need to know more about them before we can use them."

There are numerous advantages to using the umbilical cords versus the stromal bone marrow in stem cell research, Troyer said.

"We can get large numbers of cells – it's almost an inexhaustible source. They can also be obtained noninvasively, whereas bone marrow requires a biopsy," Troyer said. "The cells also survive for a long period of time in culture."

Another positive aspect of the Wharton's jelly cells is that they have no relation to the cells taken from unborn fetuses for stem cell research, which has caused a lot of controversy, Weiss said.

"We're interested in learning if these cells are therapeutic. We want to know not only if we can use them to treat diseases, but other things as well, possibly agriculture."

Mark Weiss
ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF ANATOMY AND PHYSIOLOGY

"One of the really exciting things is that these are not embryonic stem cells. They are postnatal – no fetuses were harmed," he said.

The researchers did not stop their research efforts after their initial discovery, though, Troyer said.

"We are trying to characterize them further by looking at the proteins in the cells to determine exactly what they are," he said.

"We know they're primitive, but we'd like to know just exactly how primitive they are," he said.

"We've been experimenting with them to see if they are pluripotent, which means that they can change into almost any cell.

"We have been injecting them into muscle tissue to see if they can fuse with it for possible treatment of Muscular Dystrophy."

In charge of the pluripotency experiments is Duane Davis, professor of reproductive physiology.

"We are trying to find out the full potential of the cells. We do this by altering them genetically to make a fluorescent green protein – this is the only alteration made – to keep track of them after injection," Davis said.

They are doing blastocyst testing on pig embryos. They inject a few of the Wharton's jelly cells into a developing embryo that contains six to 12 cells and observe them to see if they become part of the embryo, Davis said.

If this proves to be what they do, there is a potential ability to modify the genes of livestock in such a way that animals could be bred with the ability to resist certain diseases, Davis said.

Further, organs could be produced in pigs to be transplanted into humans.

The cells could be genetically modified so that the human body will not reject them.

"We'll know a lot more in a few months," Davis said.

Everyone on the research team, which not only includes doctors and professors, but graduate students, some undergraduate students and veterinary medicine students, are excited and optimistic about the future, Troyer said.

"It's one of the most exciting things that has happened at K-State," he said.

"It's very interesting that something that was previously just discarded could be put to medical use."

Graduate student enters City Commission race

Callahan hopes to give students voice in local issues

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Danny Callahan is kicking into second gear.

Callahan is facing his first semester of graduate school at K-State, as well as a new challenge – running for City Commission.

Announcing his candidacy was the first step in his campaign, and Callahan is now forming a committee and raising funds to help with his campaign.

"Time management is a big thing," he said. "I used to be able to just remember everything I had to do.

Now, with all the appointments and quizzes and tests coming up, I'm afraid I'll miss one thing, and I don't want to do that."

Callahan said he spoke with current and former commissioners when he was making his decision to run. The amount of time required was one of Callahan's primary concerns, he said.

Time devoted to the position varies, Callahan said, from a minimum of about eight hours per week to about 25 hours per week.

By eliminating some of his university activities, such as Student Senate and marching band, Callahan said he would fit somewhere in the middle of these extremes without hurting his schoolwork.

"It's almost a disadvantage for me," Callahan said. "The other candidates have 8-to-5 jobs, but I have to go home and study."

Zac Cook, student body president, said elections can take a huge chunk of time from a student's schedule. But, he said, Callahan shouldn't get too wrapped up in campaigning. Instead, he should focus on being true to his goals.

"Just be himself," Cook said.

In addition to the balancing act, Callahan must face another challenge – his age.

However, Commissioner Brad Everett, who will not be running against Callahan in this election, said Callahan's age should not keep him from running.

"He's an adult of legal voting age," Everett said. "So, by God, I'd certainly encourage it."

While Everett is serving his first elected position, he said he would have run at that age if he felt compelled to do so.

"He's passionate about his views," Everett said. "Had I had the same concerns, I probably would have run. Age is not a concern."

Callahan has attended Commission meetings in the past as part of his political experience, including various city committees and city relations manager for former Student Body President Jake Worcester.

If he survives the primary election, he said he expects to devote even more time to the elections.

He said progressing to the general election would require more appearances at forums and community events.

In addition, if he makes his way into office, Callahan said he hopes to inject new life into the commission meetings.

SECOND-HALF SIZZLERS

K-State manages Tigers with adjustments in second period

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State struggled Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

And then the No. 5 Wildcats sizzled.

K-State (20-2, 7-1) got 28 points from junior Nicole Ohlde, 17 from Megan Mahoney and a double-double from Kendra Wecker to pull away from Missouri (10-9, 4-4) in the second half and extend its home winning streak to 17 with a 68-52 win.

The first half belonged to the visiting cats, though.

The Tigers outmuscled K-State on the boards, scoring 11 points off 10 first-half offensive rebounds, and held the Wildcats to 38 percent shooting for the period to keep the K-State celebration muted for the opening stanza.

"We just didn't bring it the first 20 minutes," Coach Deb Patterson said, "and Missouri did."

Missouri's 32-29 halftime lead would have been more, but the Tigers – staked to a 38-percent field-goal percentage – were bothered by a cold-shooting effort of their own.

The difference: Missouri did its damage from the 3-point line.

"I don't know how many 3s they got off in the first half," Ohlde said. "That was one thing we talked about at halftime."

The Tigers drained six of 11 first-half attempts from long range to be exact, while capping K-State's 3-point attack to just six points.

K-State kept it close with 20 points in the paint, though, sparked by Ohlde's 6-of-10 first half from the field.

"They know that we have 3-point shooters, and that allows the paint to be open for some easy isos for our post players," Ohlde said. "The fact that our guards can shoot so well contributes."

Wecker's seven first-half rebounds helped too, as the Wade Trophy candidate looked for other ways to contribute after sensing early her shot was off.

Ohlde's post partner pulled down a game-high 12 rebounds and scored 11 points to book her eighth double-double of the season and the 21st of her career.

Cats second half shuts down Missouri's first half lead with 68-52 victory

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two different teams represented K-State in Wednesday's 68-52 win over the Missouri Tigers.

The Wildcat squad struggled to contain Missouri's fast-paced, inside-out attack in the first half.

The Tigers shot 36.4 percent and connected on five three-pointers in the first half to send K-State to the locker room, down at home for just the second time this season, 32-29.

Junior center Nicole Ohlde said K-State knew there were adjustments to be made in the second half.

"If you talk about the first half, that's not the way we need to be playing on defense," Ohlde said.

"We just wanted to come out and really get on their shooters, get back in case they penetrated, and contain the post."

The Wildcats did contain in the second half – and then some.

The second team K-State put on the floor frustrated the Missouri attack to the tune of just 22.2 percent shooting on six of 27 attempts.

Missouri forward Evan Unrau's hoop at the 12:38 mark would be the Tigers' lone field goal until 5:20 remained. The Wildcat lead was 10 at that point.

Snyder signs 19 players for 2003 football recruiting class

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's football program has some big holes to fill.

They must feel holes left by players like seniors Terence Newman and Tank Reese and junior Terry Pierce.

Rather than filling those holes with sand, Coach Bill Snyder might have done it with concrete.

Snyder, in a statement released Wednesday, announced the team's 2003 recruiting class, consisting of 19 players.

"Although not meeting every need, we did address the most immediate personnel concerns going into the 2003 season," Snyder said.

"We are impressed with the versatility of several of these athletes, who are very capable of playing on either side of the ball. We are equally impressed with the apparent speed and quickness at virtually every position."

That speed might be most recognizable in K-State's newly revamped secondary. With the loss of Newman and senior Bobby Walker, Snyder created depth in the defensive backfield by signing seven defensive backs.

One DB who could see the field immediately for the Wildcats is Cedrick Williams. A transfer from Garden City Community College, Williams had 12 interceptions in two years as a Bronco.

Snyder also beefed up the Cats' defensive line by signing two high school recruits and one junior college recruit.

Most notable of the three is Harper (Ill.) Junior College transfer

Wildcats must rely on positive thinking to triumph in tough matchup against Jayhawks

Believe.

It's a short but powerful word.

And on Saturday, it will be the most important word in the English language for K-State's men.

CHRIS SHANK

In order for our beloved Wildcats to beat the University of Kansas, they must believe.

Thirteen years ago, a K-State coach was in his third year.

Not much hype surrounded his teams.

His teams hadn't made it to the postseason, let alone post a winning record.

And he had never beaten the Jayhawks.

He, of course, was Coach Bill Snyder.

Right now, a K-State coach is in his third year.

Not much hype has surrounded his teams.

The Cats haven't advanced to the NIT or the NCAA tournaments.

They haven't posted a winning record under him.

And they haven't beaten the Jayhawks with him, either.

That coach, of course, is Jim Wooldridge.

When looking at Saturday's Sunflower Showdown, take a glance at all the similarities between this year's men's team and the 1991 football team.

It was a breakthrough year for Snyder's Cats on the gridiron, not just because they were his first team to post a winning record, but more importantly because they were his first team to beat the hated Jayhawks. Since the '91 season, Snyder has lost to KU only once.

In the great state of Kansas, you have to beat the Hawks to be taken seriously.

In the last two years, Wooldridge's teams have slowly made progress like Snyder's early teams. Last year, K-State defeated a top-10 team when they beat Oklahoma State at Bramlage Coliseum. Even though the Cowboys were ranked No. 9 in the country, that win didn't mean much to the media or the fans.

Saturday's game does.

Right now, a horrible streak – older than Bramlage and many of the students that will fill its seats Saturday – remains painfully intact. The Wildcats have not beaten the Jayhawks in the Little Apple since the 58-57 win in 1983. That's right, 1983. In the last 20 years, K-State has managed to beat KU six times, with all of those victories either coming in Lawrence or Kansas City, Mo.

Three different coaches have come to and gone from K-State without ever successfully defending their home court against KU.

But Wooldridge could be the one. And I'll tell you why.

Last Saturday, I, along with 10,814 purple faithful, was fortunate enough to witness one of the most exciting games in the history of Bramlage. We got to see our Cats pour their STILLWATER, Okla. – Other than the final score, Oklahoma State didn't give Eddie Sutton a whole lot to savor in his 1,000th game as a Division I coach.

The 11th-ranked Cowboys nearly squandered a 15-point first-half lead, needing a brief run in the second half to take control against K-State in a 63-55 victory Wednesday night.

Tony Allen scored 17 points and Andre Williams had seven of his team's 12 blocks in a milestone game.

The Cowboys (18-2, 7-1 Big 12) got back on track after a loss at Texas on Saturday that ended their 15-game winning streak.

"We had just been coming off a loss and we wanted to get on a roll," Williams said. "We wanted to come out tonight and re-establish ourselves."

They took a 14-2 lead in the first 3:40, and a 7-0 run a few minutes later made it 21-6 midway through the half. By that time, K-State (11-9, 2-5) had eight turnovers.

The Wildcats trailed 27-17 before scoring the final six points of the half, four of them on baskets by Tim Ellis. Then they got as close as two in the second half, 30-28, on a 3-pointer by Schyler Thomas with 16:02 left..

"I really felt like once we got things going we could play the game, provided we don't turn it over," K-State coach Jim Wooldridge said.

The Cowboys forced a turnover that Allen turned into a fast-break layup. Then Melvin Sanders, who had 14 points, scored on a layup.

The Cowboys finally were able to shake K-State with a 7-0 run midway through the second half. The Wildcats only trailed 38-34 at the 10:17 mark before Oklahoma State used its defense take over.

The Wildcats wound up with 19 turnovers. They lost for the fifth time in six games and dropped to 0-4 on the road in conference play.

THE ANIMAL WITHIN

Masked theater group performs silently as frogs, penguins, larvae to provide insight into human psyche

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Frogs leapfrogging, penguins playing musical chairs – not just another Sunday night at McCain Auditorium.

Imago Theatre will present "FROGZ," a musical comedy involving costumed actors and no spoken words, at 7 p.m. Sunday at McCain.

"It's a very different show than we're used to presenting here," said Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain.

"FROGZ" has been touring since 1986 and made two appearances on Broadway, in 2000 and 2002, Jerry Mouawad, Imago co-creator, said. It was one of the company's first productions, and it has evolved from the original play.

"It's constantly changing," Mouawad said. "The show you'll see is probably 90 percent different than it was when we created it."

The show is performed in small vignettes and gives human attributes to the animal characters to provide insight into human psychology, Mouawad said.

"They're like the old-fashioned silent-film stars," he said. "They create bits of business through physical comedy, then build the show around that."

This type of expression provides an alternative to the everyday entertainment of digital graphics and expensive cinematography, Mouawad said.

"As technology becomes more popular, anything is possible," he said. "There's been a trend of looking at things done by humans and their own hands.

"I definitely think it's more magical when it's done with the magicians' own hands."

David Ollington, assistant professor of dance, said speechless communication can have some advantages for viewers.

"Body language is a prime communicator," Ollington said. "It's a constant. It's not something people can avoid."

The universality of body language helps audiences understand communication through movement, whether it's an interpretive dance or pantomime performance, he said. Because everyone sees and deciphers body language in their everyday lives, viewers should be able to understand the message the performers are trying to convey.

"You can't walk into a room without your body language saying something," Ollington said.

However, Ollington said, there are problems that come with performing silently.

"There can be huge questions of what it means," he said. "Abstract painters run into this problem a lot. Their work is open to interpretation, so there can be vociferous discussion as to what the message is."

The animal costumes and props could help eliminate much of this debate, Ollington said, by giving the audience references for understanding.

Despite these props and costumes, Mouawad said the show remains simple. The simplicity with which the performers entertain is what really speaks to the audience, Mouawad said.

"It's ultimately economical, yet so phenomenal," he said.

Mouawad and Carol Triffle founded Imago in 1979 as a traveling masked theater, primarily playing in small towns of the Pacific Northwest. The company began touring internationally in 1986 with "FROGZ," which remains its biggest attraction.

Both Mouawad and Triffle trained with Jean Lecoq, a famed theatrical teacher. This shared experience, according to Imago's Web site, "aided Imago's creators to produce some of the most innovative performances in the United States."

Ollington said the use of movement, whether in dance or theater, can express as much or more than what can be expressed in words.

"Words can be specific and clear," he said. "But dances express the ineffable."

IN BRIEF

The Associated Press

The U.S. poet laureate opposes war with Iraq, as do some state laureates

The threatened war with Iraq has politicized the nation's poets, starting at the very top.

In comments rarely heard from a sitting U.S. poet laureate, Billy Collins has publicly declared his opposition to war and says he finds it increasingly difficult to keep politics out of his official job as literary advocate.

While at least three of Collins' predecessors also have stated their opposition to war, an incumbent laureate usually sticks to art for art's sake. Poets laureate are not political appointees; the selection is made by the Librarian of Congress, a post currently filled by James H. Billington. Collins, who receives an annual stipend of $35,000, is serving his second one-year term.

POWELL
Official makes case for attack said. But if President Jacques Chirac insists on vetoing such a resolution, Bush won't seek one.

In his presentation, Powell:

– Asserted that Iraq bulldozed and graded to conceal chemical weapons evidence at the Al Musayyib chemical complex in 2002 and had a series of cargo vehicles and a decontamination vehicle moving around at the site.

– Said Iraq is working on developing missiles with a range of 1,000 kilometers – about 620 miles – or more, putting Russia and other nations beyond Iraq's immediate neighbors in potential danger.

– Played audio tapes of what Powell said were intercepted phone conversations between Iraqi military officers.

– Cited informants as saying that Iraqis are dispersing rockets armed with biological weapons in western Iraq.

– Said Iraqi informants claim that Iraq has 18 trucks that it uses as mobile biological weapons labs.

Powell's remarks did not seem to sway the three other permanent members of the Council that, along with the United States and Britain, have veto powers.

Representatives of China, Russia and France all said the work of the weapons inspectors should continue – with the French calling for the number of inspectors to be tripled and the process strengthened.

Tang Jiaxuan, China's foreign minister, said afterward, "As long as there is still the slightest hope for political settlement, we should exert our utmost effort to achieve that."

Malcolm Wooldridge (no relation to Jim Wooldridge), a defensive tackle.

Ranked 32nd among non-high school prospects by Rivals.com, Wooldridge was named to the first-team NJCAA All-American team in 2002.

But Wooldridge does nothing to fill the hole left by projected first-round NFL pick Terry Pierce.

Snyder filled that gap by signing two junior college linebackers.

Marvin Simmons (6-1, 230) highlights the duo. In just one season at Compton (Calif.) College, Simmons had 125 tackles and 13 sacks and was tabbed as an All-American. Simmons also was ranked 51st in SuperPrep's top 100 Juco players.

"This appears to be a talented group of student-athletes, all of whom seem to be quality young men with a competitive desire to contribute to the continued success of Kansas State football," Snyder said.

hearts and souls out in a heavyweight fight against the No. 6 team in the nation.

For an entire game and overtime that was marred by 53 fouls, the Cats fought hard and courageously.

Every time OU struck, the Wildcats had an answer, until Pervis Pasco's desperate, half-court shot hit the backboard after the final buzzer.

Against the Sooners, I witnessed a team that hit its free throws, crashed the boards, believed in itself and played with confidence I had never seen in a K-State team.

A Dana Altman team would not have scored 89 points with its leading scorer in single digits.

A Tom Asbury team would have made some stupid, costly mistake in overtime if they could have even reached the extra period.

This Wooldridge team battled and hustled for an entire game and did not beat themselves.

Last Saturday, I saw more than 10,000 people go completely crazy when Tim Ellis drained that three-pointer with 0.1 seconds on the clock to send the game to overtime.

For a few moments, the "Ghost of K-State Basketball Past" was resurrected. I felt the way another generation must have felt at old Ahearn Field House.

On Saturday, as the Cats take the court against No.12 Kansas, this team has a great opportunity to go down in history as the team that liberated Manhattan from the clutches of the Jayhawks.

The Cats showed heart last Saturday – the heart necessary to beat the Hawks.

At 12:45 p.m. Saturday, this team must BELIEVE!

SIZZLE | Defense in second half helps Wildcats defeat MU by 16

was their downfall in the second half, however.

K-State used another 20 points in the paint, and got hot from outside the lane as well, to lead by as many as 19 in the game's final minutes.

"They made a few adjustments, we made a few adjustments, and their adjustments won," Missouri coach Cindy Stein said.

Adjustments like putting a greater emphasis on offensive execution and putting the wraps on the Tiger offense.

"We knew we did some things in the first half that were uncharacteristic of us," Wecker said. "On the offensive end, we weren't executing like we needed to. We talked about that at halftime, got some things figured out and came out with some intensity in the second half."

While the Cats got points on six of their first nine possessions to take a 42-36 lead at the 15:12 mark, the Tigers were mired in an offensive rut.

Missouri made just one of seven shots during that stretch, and managed only six buckets for the half, as K-State smoked to a 61-percent shooting half on 14-of-23 shooting.

"When you make stops and go down and hit shots, you can build on your lead," Mahoney said. "In the first half, we weren't doing that, we came out like a bunch of slugs.

"It really was a positive for us to prove to ourselves and to demonstrate, on a night where we had struggled as a group for at least the better part of 20 minutes, that we could kick it into another gear," Patterson said.

CATS | Cats' second-half shooting leads to win

Senior Kerensa Barr, who led Missouri with 13 points, said the Tigers' effort in the second half only helped the Wildcats' improved defense.

"We stopped moving in the second half," she said. "We stopped getting each other open. The reason we were hitting shots in the first half was because we were getting good looks.

"In the second half, we stood around too much and then we turned the ball over because we weren't attacking them. They definitely picked their defense up in the second half, but at the same time, it was on us, too."

Another effect of K-State's rejuvenated second-half defense was improved rebounding. K-State trailed Missouri 24-17 on the glass in the first half but boasted a 38-36 edge on the boards by the final buzzer.

While Missouri claimed 14 defensive rips in the first half, the Wildcats had 18 cleans to the Tigers' seven in the second.

Sophomore forward Kendra Wecker, who had a game-high 12 boards, said rebounding was a hot topic during K-State's halftime discussion.

"They outrebounded us in the first half," Wecker said. "Coach P. really stressed at halftime to get on the boards and not let them have so many second chances.

"We need to keep teams off the glass. That, in turn, allows us to get the ball, outlet quick and push it up the floor."

Patterson said the Wildcats' second-half defense was a testament to the kind of team K-State is capable of putting on the floor.

"We came out in the second half with a new commitment to our assignments and to a higher level of intensity," Patterson said. "We found a sense of urgency regarding how we needed to play.

"To hold a team to under 25 percent in a half, any team in this league, is significant," she said.

"It demonstrates to our basketball team what we're capable of when we truly bring the focus."

MUSEUM MOMENTS

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, located on the southeast side of campus, has been host to 111,168 visitors as of the end of the fiscal year. The museum is open to the public, and its hours of operations are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Friday and 1 p.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday and Sunday.

DEADLINE | Filing deadline approaches for SGA candidates; technical voting problems solved required for all students running for office, Threeton said. Candidates must attend one of the three meetings, including: 8 and 9 p.m. Feb. 11 and 4 p.m. Feb. 12.

All meetings will be in the Union Little Theatre.

Student Body President Zac Cook said he is planning on attending these meetings to offer suggestions on what made his campaign successful.

Gayle Spencer, coordinator of student activities and services, said the filing deadline is set weeks before the elections because it gives elections officials time to clear all candidates, making sure candidates meet all eligibility requirements.

In addition, Spencer said the filing deadline gives candidates only about a week to prepare campaign materials, which are allowed to be posted on campus beginning Feb. 18.

Last year's elections were the first to use a primary election to narrow down the presidential candidates.

Under this system, the top two presidential tickets appear on the ballot during the general elections.

In previous years, the field was narrowed in the general election, then decided in a run-off election.

Cook said the previous system attracted fewer voters to the final vote, which limited the number of students placing a vote for president.

Election timeline

- Filing deadline: 4 p.m. Feb. 11
- Campaigning begins: Feb. 18
- Expenditure report deadline: Feb. 21
- Primary elections: Feb. 25-26
- General elections: March 4-5
- Filing applications, as well as a list of elections regulations, are available at www.k-state.edu/elections.

"The president is going to be a figurehead for students for the next year," Cook said. "Everyone will associate the president with the student body, so I think it's important to get as many people voting for that as possible. It's a better system than it used to be."

While there were some problems last year with the new system of online voting, Threeton said the problems have been worked out.

"We learned a lot from last year to this year," he said.

"We have a rock-solid program for voting."

As officials prepare for the impending elections, candidates have started declaring their intentions.

As of Wednesday, Senate Chair John O'Hara and his running mate, Privilege Fee Chair Travis Stryker, were the only students to have filed for student body president and vice-president.

Cook said he hopes more students will file to run for the various offices available.

"I'd encourage people to get out and file," he said.

WEEKEND | Less crowds, drink specials among Thursday night perks

on drinks.

"The good thing about Thursdays are the drink specials, and there aren't as many people as there are on the weekends," Van Daele said.

Coones said he also goes to the bars because of the drink specials.

"The only reason I go is because Aggie Station has dollar bottles," he said.

He also said he likes not having to wait in line for a drink when he goes out on Thursdays.

"That's what's good about weekdays," Coones said. "I don't even go out on weekends anymore."

Meritt said another advantage is a more laid-back atmosphere.

"I think it's a little more mellow," Meritt said. "People aren't as crazy."

Jamie Stewart, bartender at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon, said she notices quite a few more people out on Thursday nights as opposed to other weeknights. She said that in her experience, the atmosphere is about the same on Thursdays as it is on the weekend.

"It's closer to the weekend," she said. "At the beginning of the week, there's more studying. But as you approach the weekend, you see more people out."

Because of the number of students who party on Thursday evening, the effects often can be observed the next day on campus.

Angelique Courbou, instructor of Spanish, said that because of the attendance policy in her class, most students don't skip, but she does notice some people definitely look tired from the night before.

"Some people I notice are at a lower level," she said. "They're still hung over from the night before, but I wouldn't say it's the majority."

She said students may come to class only if they are capable of staying awake and participating.

"If they're going to be sleeping in the corner, they might as well stay home. But if they're going to try, then they should definitely come to class," Courbou said.

Courbou said that without the attendance policy, many more students would not attend class on Fridays.

While some students may skip class on Fridays or appear to be sleeping through lectures, many students don't have Friday classes to worry about, enabling them to stay out later on Thursdays.

According to the 2003 spring course list, available at www.ksu.edu, about 3,454 classes are offered at K-State, with only 1,003 of those classes meeting on Fridays.

Darwin Abbott, director of KSU Parking Services, said that on Fridays and Mondays, fewer people are on campus, which is reflected by a general trend of fewer tickets issued on those days.

"Statistically, it's hard to say precisely if this is because of people going out, but there's definitely a lot less people on campus those days," Abbott said.

To avoid being tired and hung over at work or class Friday morning, Meritt mentioned certain "rules" to going out on Thursdays, such as getting home at 1 a.m. to get enough sleep. He also said it's a good idea not to get "crazy drunk" if you have class the next day.

USHERS | Students earn extra cash by assisting at Bramlage Coliseum

fans. Lee said she is asked why the ushers walk down the stairs during timeouts.

"I usually joke with people and tell them the reason why is because our bosses think we need the exercise," Lee said. "But then I tell them that if we have people throwing stuff on the floor, we can see who did it and if people on the bottom of the sections have questions to ask, they can ask them without going to the top."

Lee has worked as an usher for two years and makes $6.30 per hour. She usually works two games per week, which averages out to eight to 12 hours.

Aaron Timmons, lead patron staff supervisor, said about 35 students are employed as ushers, and starting pay is $6 per hour.

Ushers are not required to qualify for work study, and it is not a decision factor when hiring. Timmons usually hires the majority of his staff from applications received at the K-State Student Union Job Fair, which takes place in the fall, he said.

When choosing applicants, Timmons said he looks for personable people.

"I try to test their ability to handle pressure situations intact," Timmons said.

Chris Beverlin, freshman in architectural engineering, filled out an application at the Union Job Fair and now has worked at Bramlage for three months. He said there are advantages to the job.

"I like the opportunity to make money while supporting K-State athletics," he said.

Beverlin said he has not had much trouble with fans, but he has encountered some rude but humorous fans.

"One time I had a fan ask me if my momma was refereeing the game," he said.

PARTY | Students start weekends early, schedule no classes on Fridays

again to go to the Purple Pig at midnight.

In all, McLain said the weekend was a success.

"Somebody usually doesn't get arrested, but it's probably a typical weekend," McLain said. "The weekend was a '10' all the way."

Dara Desaire, senior in elementary education, spent Thursday at Rusty's and Aggie Station as well.

Desaire went out with five friends and stayed until 2:30 a.m. She said Thursdays usually are a good night for her to go out.

"I like Thursdays better," Desaire said. "They have cheaper drinks, and I don't have classes on Fridays."

City, Wal-Mart approve plan to fix streets

Transportation project's fund sources still uncertain

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wal-Mart Supercenter will finally become a reality after more than four years of ordinances, petitions, changes in location and a court proceeding.

However, city officials now have to decide how to get around and who will foot the bill for the traffic problem at the intersection of Tuttle Creek Boulevard and Bluemont Avenue.

Road improvement

City Engineer Jeff Hancock said that after more than nine revisions, the city and Wal-Mart have approved a street improvement plan that will do just that.

"There will be numerous changes close to several million dollars," Hancock said. "There will be changes to Bluemont, Third Street, Tuttle Creek, Frontage Road, McCall, Hayes, Hostetler – basically all roads around the site."

Hancock said the plan will redirect Frontage Road, extend Bluemont Avenue and add lanes, medians and traffic signals to streets around the 22.5-acre site.

A city-owned storm drainage pond, located just west of the American Legion building, also will be moved north to make way for additional Wal-Mart parking.

Bill Long, finance officer for American Legion Post 17, said Wal-Mart also will purchase land from the organization to make way for parking.

"The real estate transaction hasn't been fully completed yet, but changes won't affect the looks of our building or our internal operation," Long said. "It will only change our parking lot materially."

Hancock said road construction will begin sometime in mid-May, with McCall Road construction expected to be completed by Oct. 15 and all other street improvements substantially completed by Dec. 31.

"They may still be out there doing some work,

Senate takes final action on Bands Program privilege fee

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate took final action on a bill to increase the University Bands Program privilege fee Thursday night, passing with a unanimous vote.

As a result, the annual department privilege fee budget for the fiscal years 2004, 2005 and 2006 will total at $146,057.

"(The band) adds a lot to all of the events they attend," Travis Stryker, privilege fee chair, said. "They are underfunded extremely."

Erin Green, senator and band member, said that everyone throughout the community has seen or heard the band at one time. The additional money, she said, will be welcomed by many.

"Even though I wanted an increase of 100 percent, I'm very pleased with 30 percent," Green said.

In addition, a resolution to amend the standing rules during Student Senate meetings was passed with a 29-17-4 vote Thursday night.

The resolution, which included a statement on the limitations of campaigning during meetings, caused a debate among Senate members.

"This is a resolution to make Senate more efficient," Lisa Tirrell, senate operations chair, said. "This is to pay more attention to the Senate meeting and not worry about elections at that time."

However, Eleri Griffin, student affairs chair, said she felt the resolution meant much more.

"This was intended for all of the best in mind," she said. "But I believe it does delve into some form of free speech."

Because the resolution passed, Senate members will not be able to participate in active campaigning during meetings.

Student senate

The following items were discussed at Thursday night's Student Senate meeting:

- A bill to increase the University Bands Program privilege fee and an allocation to the Women's Softball Club passed unanimously.
- A resolution to amend the standing rules during a Senate meeting passed with a 29-17-4 vote.
- The continuance of the Union Program Council privilege fee was held for referral.
- A resolution to place questions about the smoking policy change on the spring 2003 election ballot was held for referral.

Bush: Game is over

President welcomes another U.N. resolution

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

WASHINGTON – Edging closer to war, President Bush declared Thursday "the game is over" for Saddam Hussein and urged skeptical allies to join in disarming Iraq.

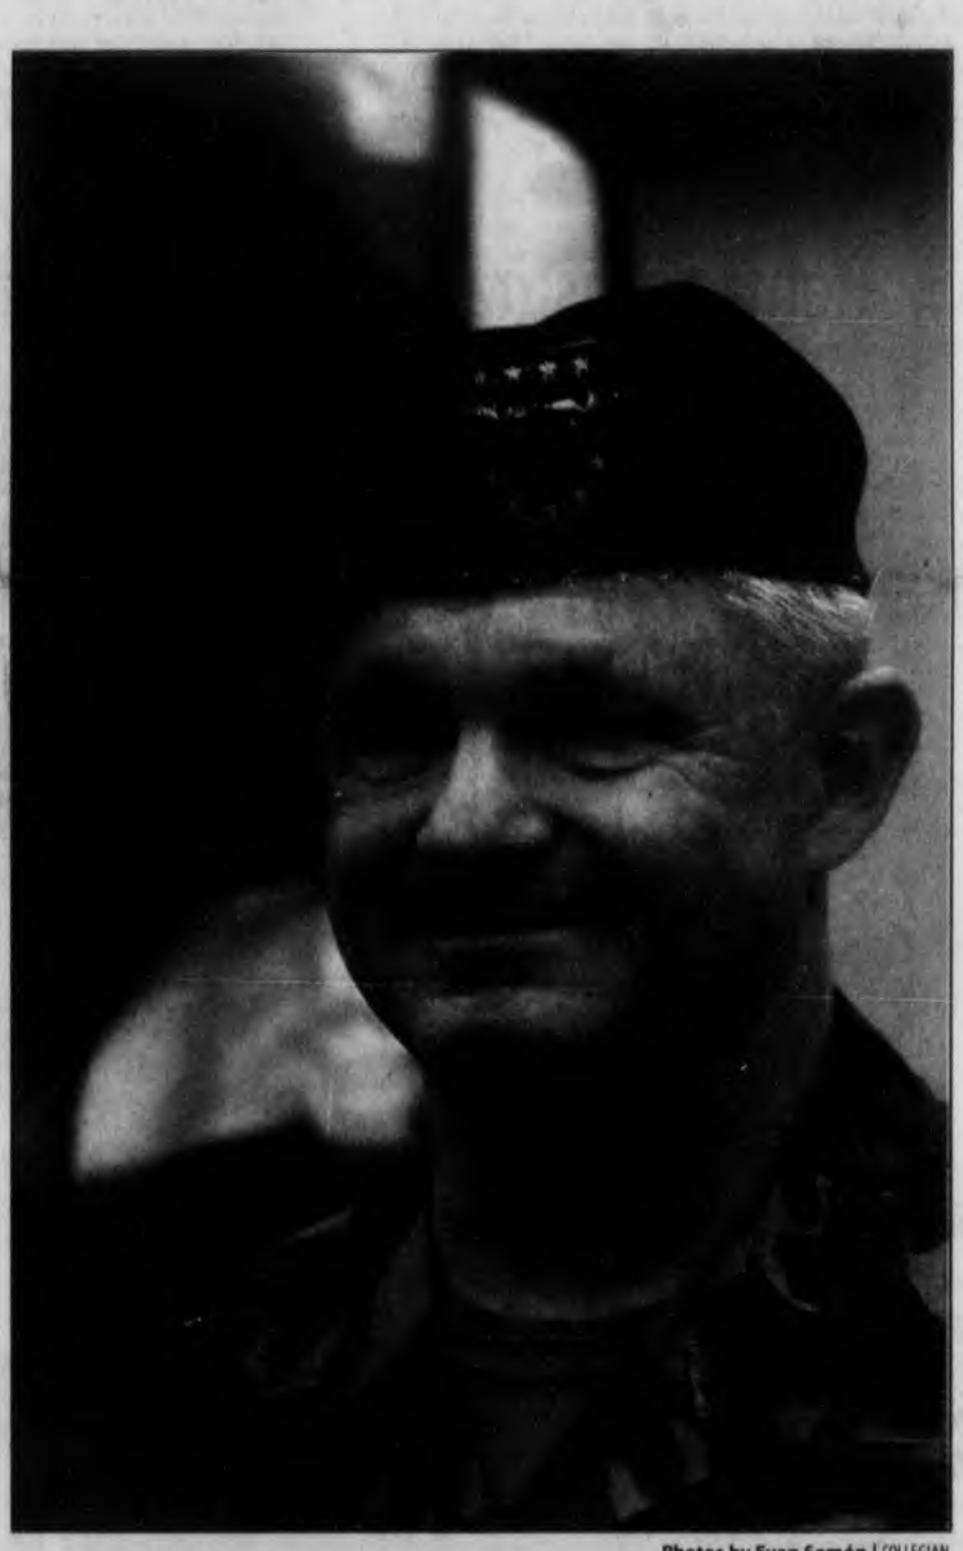
Bush said he would welcome a new U.N. resolution on Iraq if it made clear the world body was ready to use force if Saddam will not reveal and give up any weapons of mass destruction as demanded by an earlier resolution.

Britain is likely to introduce such a resolution authorizing force after top weapons inspectors return from Baghdad and report to the Security Council on Feb. 14, British and U.S. diplomats said Thursday.

Unlike Britain, France has balked at the idea of war, and Jean-Marc de La Sabliere, French ambassador to the United Nations, said Thursday, "the time has not come" for a second resolution.

"The U.N. must not back down," Bush said. "All the world can rise to this moment."

"Saddam Hussein will be stopped," Bush pledged, warning anew that the United States will act along with allies if needed.



He spoke before cameras in the White House's Roosevelt Room with Secretary of State Colin Powell at his side.

Behind the president was a painting of Theodore Roosevelt, who led the United States into war with Spain in 1898, on horseback.

At the United Nations in New York, the Iraqi representative, Mohammed al-Douri, said of Bush, "It sounds like he wants a

It was a teary goodbye Thursday morning as Fort Riley soldiers bid farewell to their commanding general, Lt. Gen. Thomas Metz as he relinquished command of the 24th Infantry Division Mechanized and Fort Riley.

Metz now moves to Fort Hood, Texas, as commanding general after a Dec. 16 presidential nomination.

Metz will officially assume command of the III Corps in a ceremony today at Fort Hood.

With the U.S. Army entering a possible war with Iraq, Metz said his soldiers are well-trained and ready.

"These soldiers are flat good, tough, physically fit and ready for a fight," Metz said.

"There are many important challenges ahead for the United States Army."

Since his arrival in November 2001, Metz said he Insurance recommended to area renters

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jamie Alstrom didn't know much about renter's insurance before she started renting.

"When I started renting, I didn't think about it," Alstrom, senior in kinesiology, said. "But when I went looking for apartments, that was one thing they recommended."

But for many renters, insurance is something they don't know much about.

"Not a lot of students are aware of renter's insurance," said Wanda Bruckerhoff, a licensed staff member at State Farm Insurance.

"We have a few that come in to take out renter's insurance, usually because their parents tell them to, or they have heard from a friend."

Renters sometimes don't realize their personal belongings are not covered by the landlord's insurance.

"Renter's insurance covers losses such as theft, vandalism, wind storms and fires,".

"You never know when something is going to happen," Bruckerhoff said.

Angela Mosburg, leasing coordinator at University Commons, said information about renter's insurance is included in the lease to make tenants aware of it.

"There is a section in our lease that asks them if they have renter's insurance or if they plan on getting it," she said.

Bruckerhoff said some insurance companies extend the coverage from the parent's homeowner's policy to the student's belongings at school.

Alstrom said she thinks she could be covered by her parents insurance, but she is not sure.

If renters are not sure if they are covered by their parents, Bruckerhoff said they should check to make sure their things are covered in one way or another.

"Once you start adding up what it would cost to replace what you have," she said, "you'd be surprised at what you actually have."

Bruckerhoff said renter's insurance is generally inexpensive.

She said an average quote for a local resident with about $25,000 replacement cost and $250 deductible would be a monthly fee of $14. Individual needs and the company will vary, however.

Approximate quotes can be made on insurance company Web sites or over the phone.

Alstrom still does not have renter's insurance, but she said it's a good idea.

"I would be worried if something did happen and my stuff wouldn't be covered," she said.

Renter's insurance safeguards students

By Josh Novak
IOWA STATE DAILY

AMES, Iowa - Fires, floods and windstorms are not always on the minds of students when signing a lease.

But the damage done to belongings during such disasters, along with more mundane problems such as leaky pipes, often are only covered by renter's insurance, not the insurance of a landlord.

Dawn Johnson, an insurance agent for State Farm Insurance, said most students are not aware they need to purchase renter's insurance on their own.

"In order for personal belongings to be covered, a renter must have renter's insurance," Johnson said.

She said that without renter's insurance, renters would have to replace their lost or damaged belongings themselves.

Sara Dlouhy, an Iowa State University senior in early childhood education, rents out an old house in Ames. Like most older dwellings, faulty wiring and other hazards are a concern.

Because of the house's age and potential problems, her parents suggested she get renter's insurance.

"I never realized nothing [of mine] was covered," Dlouhy said.

Marci Baldwin, owner of Marci Baldwin Allstate Insurance of Ames, said a low percentage of college students that have renter's insurance.

She said when talking with college students, she strongly encourages them to purchase the insurance.

However, she said many ISU students have chosen not to heed her advice. Cost is often the reason students opt not to purchase renter's insurance, she said.

Johnson said renter's insurance is relatively cheap.

"Our policies start out at around $10 a month," she said.

Johnson said that monthly fee would get a renter $25,000 worth of coverage.

Baldwin said renter's insurance policies with Allstate begin at about $100 a year, which provides $10,000 worth of coverage.

Another advantage of having renter's insurance, Johnson said, is in the event a renter cannot live in the rental unit after a disaster.

"[The insurance company] would put you into a hotel in case of an accident [to your rented property]. You won't be homeless."

Baldwin said, aside from covering damages to property, with renter's insurance, the renter will have liability coverage.

This means if someone were in a renter's apartment and was injured there, renters insurance would cover any injuries incurred, preventing the renters themselves from getting sued, she said.

Proposal focuses on district consolidation

Manhattan-Ogden superintendent to present plan to Board of Education on Tuesday

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas schools may have a different look in the next few years.

In response to legislation complaints about inefficiencies, Sharol Little, USD 383 Manhattan-Ogden superintendent, developed a proposal to reorganize the school districts in Kansas and will present her plan to the State Board of Education on Tuesday.

Little, along with Ken Kennedy, superintendent for Pratt public schools, created the plan as a model for what could be done to save money in Kansas.

She said the plan calls for a reduction in school districts, which would be more cost-efficient.

In addition, Little said there is one large benefit to the plan.

"The fact is, you could have 40 regional districts instead of 304, so you would not have to raise taxes," she said.

Little said 40 districts were decided on for statistical reasons.

"There are 46,000 school children in the state of Kansas, and when you divide that by 40, you get 11,000 children per district," Little said.

Little's proposal includes having four Regional Education Districts.

The proposed districts include the following: the South Central District, an area around Pratt that would consist of 17 school districts; the Northeast District, an area around Manhattan that would consist of nine school districts; the Southwest District, an area around Dodge City that would include 15 school districts; and the Central District, an area around Salina that would include 15 school districts.

Little said the plan would reduce costs because each of the four regions would have one board to represent all of the districts in their zone.

Roger Brannon, Manhattan-Ogden Board of Education president, said the strain for Kansas schools that Little mentioned in her presentation to the school board was consistent with what he had heard for the Kansas Association of School Boards.

"KASB has stressed to us a need for consolidation, "he said.

However, Brannon said there were some disadvantages to the plan.

One of the limitations in having fewer districts may call for students – particularly those living in western Kansas – to ride the bus for a long period of time, he said.

In addition, Little said she thinks the Kansas Legislature will have to make some tough decisions about the future of public schools because of a $300 million state budget deficit, as well as issues with understaffed state schools.

Larry Weaver, board member and professor of physics, said one hurdle will be overcoming people's love for their local schools.

"People are pretty happy with the local schools," Weaver said.

"And anytime closing a school gets mentioned, they get very upset."

Rick Doll, USD 323 Rock Creek superintendent, said his school district is growing and doesn't feel the need to consolidate.

However, Doll said they would consider collaborating on certain services such as special education and staff development.

While Rock Creek may not need to consolidate, Doll said there will be a need for some schools.

"Some small school districts with declining enrollment may need to consolidate." Doll said.

"Also, those small school districts trying to operate multiple buildings will not be able to continue."

Doll also said research is in favor of maintaining smaller schools.

"Recent education research has shown that smaller is better," he said.

"However, efforts to cut costs by consolidating services may be the way to help cut cost and still retain local schools."

In addition, Doll said Rock Creek is able to offer all – if not more – of the opportunities a large school provides.

The concerns are for schools that don't offer the resources that larger schools provide, Weaver said.

"For instance, if you have a class of five students and the school can't afford to hire a physics teacher to teach classes the students need for college admission – what do you say to those students?" Weaver said.

"Do you just tell them you need to do really well on your ACT?"

During her presentation, Little said there is one thing she hopes legislators get from the presentation.

"Your address should not determine the kind of education you get," she said.

Kansas superintendents seek district reduction

By John Milburn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – Legislators found an idea for reorganizing the state's 303 school districts into regional education districts "intriguing" and meriting further discussion.

A team of three superintendents and a former district finance director presented their idea Thursday morning to the House Education Committee, outlining how, with as few as 40 districts, the state could improve education while redistributing scarce dollars for salaries, supplies and health benefits.

"It's a very intriguing idea," said House Education Chairman Kathy Decker.

"I think people are kind of thinking it through."

The four authors of the proposal estimate that reorganization would save $240 million to $480 million that would be redistributed among the remaining districts.

"We like that," said Rep. Frank Miller, R-Independence. "We would be delighted if we didn't have to raise school budgets."

As presented, the state would reorganize school districts from the current 303 to as few as 40, or about 11,000 students each. Districts would have one superintendent, one negotiated contract and salary schedule with staff, and fewer buildings.

The state spends $2.3 billion on aid to its school districts, but education officials don't believe that amount – $3,863 per pupil – is enough.

The presentation on reorganizing districts was made by Manhattan Superintendent Sharol Little; Salina Superintendent Gary Norris; Pratt Superintendent Ken Kennedy; and Morris Reeves, former finance director with the Dodge City district, who also is one of Gov. Kathleen Sebelius' 28 education advisers.

"This is only an idea," Little said, noting that it was the product of three years of research.

A similar presentation was to be made to senators later Thursday.

She said while there is support among school administrators for exploring reorganization, there are opponents.

At one recent meeting, a superintendent told Little he would be fired if his local board knew he was even listening to the idea.

"I don't see this happening without a push from the legislature," Little said.

Rep. Bill Reardon, D-Kansas City, said while the concept would take several years to implement, the climate was changing among legislators to revisit what was a painful experience in the 1960s, when the state last forced consolidation.

"I think it's important in any education endeavor that you have people willing to look beyond today and tomorrow," Reardon said.

He added that it was important that as the consolidation debate begins that legislators think globally and not think in terms as urban or rural.

The focus, he said, needs to be on the good of all students.

Decker said the concept would be included in a bill that she would introduce in committee to continue the reorganization debate.

Professor: pornography has potential to cause harm

Law professor addresses pornography, negative consequences of 1st Amendment protection

By Tina Deines
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pornography is protected under the First Amendment, but as a product, it has the potential to harm, a speaker said Thursday night.

Law professor Marianne "Mimi" Wesson spoke on "Pornography and Civil Rights" as part of the Dorothy L. Thompson Civil Rights Lecture Series.

In her speech, at the K-State Alumni Center, Wesson expressed her views on the correlation between pornography and the First Amendment.

In the first part of her speech, "Giant or Whip," Wesson shared her feelings about speech in society with regard to the protection of free speech.

"The general tenor seems to be that speech is a wimp," Wesson said.

"Words aren't really as potent as we give them credit for being."

Speech can make a profound effect on an individual, she said.

"If you believe that – and I do from the bottom of my heart – that reading good books, exposing yourself to beautiful art and watching profound films make you better, then you must believe that ugly speech makes you worse," Wesson said.

Next Wesson transitioned to part two of her speech, "Bicycles."

Wesson also made the proposal that creators of pornographic material should have the same liabilities as any other company that markets products.

To support her argument, Wesson compared the pornography market to any other market, namely bicycles.

When sold, she said, part of the revenue from a bicycle is put into liability for the company.

Wesson said creators of pornography should have the same liability.

The makers of such material are responsible for any harm caused as a result of someone watching them, she said.

"If someone is harmed by someone that has viewed this type of material, that person has a right to bring a lawsuit against the person that generated the depiction," Wesson said.

Although many people argue that pornography is protected under the First Amendment's freedom of speech, she said it is important to realize there is a fine line between speech and non-speech.

"Pornography is speech, but pornography is also a product that is sold," Wesson said.

"When someone can prove harm, the First Amendment shouldn't get in the way of that lawsuit."

TO THE POINT

Wildcat fans must show spirit against Kansas

K-State's most-hated rival comes to Manhattan on Saturday.

It's time for you to show your true colors this weekend when Jayhawks of all shapes and sizes will be here to see their beloved team take on the Wildcats.

If you haven't busted out the purple since the end of football season, now is the time.

Coach Jim Wooldridge's troops will do their part on the hardcourt, and in the stands they'll be relying on fans to make things rough on KU's Roy Williams and crew.

Bramlage Coliseum already is sold out for Saturday's 12:45 p.m. tip, but for those of you who don't have tickets, don't fret.

The game also will be televised on ESPN+, so gather all the Wildcat fans who weren't able to get tickets and cheer in front of a TV.

If K-State plays its cards right, this could be the game Wildcat fans talk about for years to come.

Bush should follow Kennedy's example, support NASA with bold progression

ANDREW LAWSON

"Now it is time to take longer strides – time for a great new American enterprise – time for this nation to take a clearly leading role in space achievement."

John F. Kennedy spoke these words May 25, 1961.

America was in the midst of the Cold War. The Soviet Union was beating the United States in the space race. The Bay of Pigs invasion had just concluded and was a disastrous failure, and Vietnam was starting to heat up.

Kennedy's call to put a man on the moon within a decade united America. He gave distressed people a noble goal.

Today, America is in the midst of a war on terrorism. Our military is poised to attack Iraq. We still mourn those killed on Sept. 11, 2001. And six days ago, seven astronauts were lost serving a space program that Kennedy could only have envisioned.

Now there is talk of cutting the space program or at least manned missions.

"After this recent tragedy, I am more adamant about ditching the space program," Damon Herbert of Mentor, Ohio said.

"The government can find better ways to spend tax dollars. I cannot imagine what doing scientific experiments in zero gravity is going to do for millions of American taxpayers. Satellites are essential, [but] the manned space program needs to go; we're not competing with the Russians anymore."

In some ways, he's right. Unless there is an accident, Americans don't really notice the space program anymore.

One reason is the missions are, well, boring. Shuttle crews are often assigned mundane but necessary tasks like satellite repair and space-station construction.

When they do perform science, it usually results in important but unheralded developments, such as Velcro.

This doesn't mean we should scrap manned space exploration, however. We especially should not panic and cut funding in light of the Columbia's disintegration.

Many people realize this already, like Lisa Wormington of North Charleston, S.C., who said, "[Discontinuing manned missions] would be such a dismissal of everything that the seven Columbia astronauts held sacred."

Donald Getz of Bartonsville, Penn., said, "The insult to the memory of those who have died in the quest to explore space would be the greatest loss. If we could ask those who have died, what would they say? [T]hey paid the greatest price of all."

Montie Arkel of Lawton, Okla., said it best: "[The space program] can't end here."

Unfortunately, there are still those like Damon Herbert who don't understand how important it is to continue manned exploration of space.

President Bush needs to do something besides increase NASA's budget. He needs to take a bold new step in manned space flight.

He needs to give us, the distressed people, a new noble goal.

To paraphrase President Kennedy, I believe that this nation should commit itself to achieving the goal, before this decade is out, of landing a man on Mars and returning him safely to earth.

This isn't as radical as it might sound, though it is bold.

The idea has been around for years now, but no serious effort has been made to pursue it.

By making a public declaration as Kennedy did, Bush could inspire that serious effort. Resolving to do something is at least half the work.

Even Kennedy foresaw this as an eventual step in the space program.

In his famous 1961 speech, he said, "This gives promise of some day providing a means for even more exciting and ambitious exploration of space, perhaps beyond the moon, perhaps to the very ends of the solar system itself."

"Space is open to us now," he said, "and our eagerness to share its meaning is not governed by the efforts of others. We go into space because whatever humanity must undertake, free men must fully share."

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Television, computer software may help children develop intellectual capacity

Dear Editor:

Reading Kathryn Hollingsworth's column about media stealing children from opportunities to use their imagination made me want to express my views on the subject.

Although I do agree a child should have his or her time away from the television and computer, I believe media can stimulate a child's mind by giving new ideas, encouraging interactivity, and more realistically, immersing them into a new realm.

One point made in the column read, "Children are developing life-altering skills in their early childhood. Their brain development during this crucial period will affect facets such as their attention spans, learning abilities and problem-solving skills in adolescence and adulthood."

This statement is 100-percent correct. Media can, and do, play a huge role in this aspect of a child's life. However, it can play a positive role. Watching young children – and adults – become immersed in "SpongeBob SquarePants" may appear to be wasting away their minds. But inside, their heads are full of thoughts.

They listen to the storyline, they laugh at the sometimes-silly humor and, when the television gets turned off, they occasionally find themselves dreaming up new ideas of things to pretend to do with either SpongeBob or his oceanic friends.

Once away from the Television, children may be inclined to hop on the computer. Available for the computer are a wide variety of SpongeBob games.

These software packages offer an astonishing amount of puzzles that encourage the gamer to think through all the possibilities in hopes that they may get one step closer to the end. Through this interactive activity, the children will learn new ways of solving problems.

Throughout the time on the computer, children may be into the game so much that they may think they are really part of it. It may not happen as much with a cartoon game like SpongeBob.

But the increasing affordability of more-powerful machines raises the probability that children will soon have the games at their hands that allow them to more realistically interact with what used to be mere figments of their imagination.

Why spend time scraping at the ground with a stick when you could explore and solve problems in new worlds, all while staying clean? Don't be afraid to give children the opportunity to take advantage of the media that is available.

Bosco, task force strive to improve K-State's name with academic honor

Dear Editor,

This letter is in response to the Personality Profile on Pat Bosco, Dean of Student Life, which appeared in the Jan. 22 edition of the Collegian.

When asked if he had cheated on a test, Bosco, it seems, hastily replied, "Probably."

This is not an unusual remark if you consider the national statistics on student self-reported cheating at the collegiate level. As members of the Honor System, we feel this is the pervasive "it's no big deal" culture we are striving to change.

We believe Bosco really does care about academic integrity. After all, he was on the task force appointed by the provost to investigate an alternative policy after K-State's name was dragged through the national dirty-laundry list in 1994. We know, and fully appreciate, that Bosco supports and encourages academic integrity at K-State.

He knows that K-State's reputation is based not only on prowess in our athletic endeavors.

Nor is its reputation based only on the high number of our students receiving prestigious scholarships. K-State's reputation should also be based on graduates who earn an honest degree.

Bosco is helping support the Honor System as it strives to become a part of the culture here at K-State. In his responsibilities as Dean of Student Life, Bosco makes certain that incoming students know about the Honor System and its student-development perspective. Administrators such as Bosco and Provost Coffman understand and support the need for academic integrity where students realize the value of honest academic work.

Bosco may have cheated on a test in his academic career. Nationwide, student self-reports indicate that between 75 and 95 percent of students do cheat at least once in their college careers. This is the culture H.I.P.E. wants to change at K-State.

It is our hope that the Honor System will help K-State become a better institution – an institution whose graduates are better prepared to make an ethical impact in their chosen careers.

Thank you all for supporting academic integrity.

TRAINING FOR BREAK

Freshman begins 6-week spring break fitness program, plans to take training seriously to improve health

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

She'll spend the next six weeks eating right, toning up and changing her lifestyle under the watchful eye of more than 20,000 readers.

Meet Cara Shufelberger, freshman in secondary education.

In an effort to improve her health, Shufelberger will meet with fitness consultants once a week, until Spring Break, to measure her progress.

At 5-foot-9, 166 pounds and 17.2 percent body fat, she attended her first personal fitness session Thursday in the Rec Complex's Wellness Resource Center.

"I'm just looking to improve my body-fat percentage," she said.

"I'd like to lose some weight, but I'm not looking to lose 30 pounds or anything – just trim up."

Although Shufelberger played sports in high school, she said she hasn't seen as much physical activity since coming to K-State last fall.

She signed up for the Wellness Center's Spring Break Training Program after receiving a Rec Listserv message two weeks ago.

"I thought it sounded like a fun way to get into shape. I'm just lucky I got signed up before it was full," she said.

"This will just get me into the habit. It isn't a crash diet or anything. It's more of a habit, or lifestyle, change."

A lifestyle change that involves cardiovascular exercise, strength training and measured food portions.

Getting fit

Follow freshman Cara Shufelberger for six weeks during her Spring Break training program at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Fitness Consultant Stephanie Caouette, senior in kinesiology, began Shufelberger's first session by suggesting an individualized workout routine.

"I ask students what exercises they like to do and how much time they have," Caouette said. "We try to start off slow at first and eventually increase the intensity of workouts."

Shufelberger said her workout will vary during the week.

"I'll work out every day but Sunday," she said.

"I'll do a cardiovascular workout everyday, lift weights on Thursday, Saturday and Tuesday, and do ab workouts Friday, Monday and Wednesday."

Caouette said Shufelberger will complete a form every week, recording the type, intensity and duration of each exercise.

Shufelberger said she wouldn't mind filling out the form.

"I told her what I want to work on, and now I have a program that is more tailored for me," she said.

"It's more than just a generalized workout, and I like that."

Fitness Consultant Tiffany Bullard also met with Shufelberger, explaining the portions of a healthy diet.

"Being on a diet means restricting your calories," Bullard said.

"People need to learn how to eat healthy all the way around."

Evan Sémon | COLLEGIAN

Cara Shufelberger, freshman in secondary education, gets measured by Fitness Consultant Stephanie Caouette, senior in kinesiology, to begin her first session of the Wellness Center's Spring Break Training Program.

Bullard told Shufelberger to keep a three-day record of her diet, eating consistently throughout the day in order to keep her metabolism high.

Bullard suggested to Shufelberger that she eat two snacks and three meals a day, including all food groups.

"It's a total amount of what you eat throughout the day, not when you eat it," she said. "That's a common myth."

Shufelberger said she was surprised by the advice.

"It seems so reverse of what you normally hear, like you're always supposed to eat before a certain time or only eat when you're not hungry," she said.

Shufelberger said she also will eat using food groups as a guide, rather than counting calories.

"I was expecting more of a counting-calorie diet," she said. "I'm glad, though – this will be a lot easier to stick to."

Regardless of diet choice, Shufelberger won't be alone.

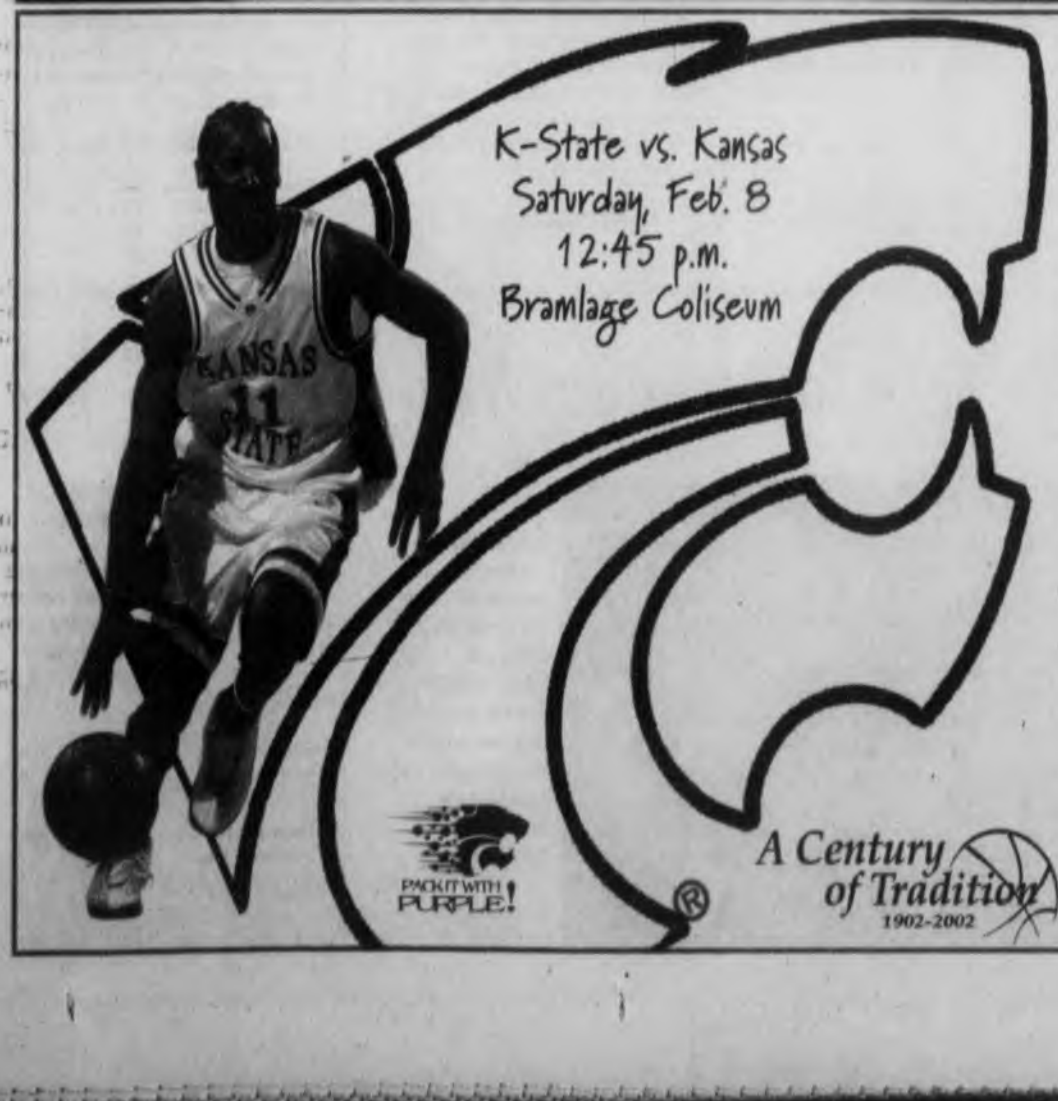
"Having so many people watching you is more of an incentive to exercise," she said.

"Plus, I'll have a friend doing it with me to keep me motivated."

Jillian Brack, freshman in human resource management, and friend of Shufelberger will be exercising and training with Shufelberger during the next several weeks.

"Working out will give us time to exercise our jaws as well as our muscles," she said. "It will give us time to gab."

Shufelberger said she won't be taking the training and fitness program too lightly, though.



"This isn't just a crash diet before Spring Break," she said.

"I want to do this the right way."

No. 12/11 Kansas vs. K-State

THE SEARCH CONTINUES

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN

Pervis Pasco shoots the ball during K-State's overtime loss to Oklahoma on Saturday. The Cats take on KU at 12:45 p.m. Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Cats focus on solid play, not streak

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One number has stuck in the minds of K-State fans this season – 20.

Twenty years have passed since K-State fans have witnessed a Wildcat victory over KU in Manhattan.

On Jan. 29, 1983, the Wildcats beat the Jayhawks 58-57 in Ahearn Field House. Now, 20 years later and 15 years after the last game played in Ahearn, K-State is left searching for a victory against the Jayhawks in Manhattan.

No. 12/11 Kansas (16-5, 6-1) at K-State (11-9, 2-5)

When: 12:45 p.m. Saturday
Where: Bramlage Coliseum (13,340)
Key stat: K-State hasn't beat the Jayhawks in Manhattan since 1983

That chance comes again Saturday when the No. 12/11 Jayhawks visit Manhattan for a 12:45 p.m. tip.

The streak is not what the Wildcats have focused on all week, though. Coach Jim Wooldridge said he is more concerned with the problems the Jayhawks pose to K-State.

"I don't think the quote-unquote losing streak gets into their heads," he said. "I think they understand the caliber of team that Kansas presents.

"If you think about it, Kansas is on 'Big Monday,' they're in the preseason polls as one of the top teams in the country, and our guys are basketball players and fans," Wooldridge said. "KU is one of those teams that demands a lot of attention, and because of that, I think that is what the game is about, not the losing streak."

After committing 19 turnovers in a 63-55 loss to Oklahoma State on Wednesday night, the team's focus is more on giving a solid effort and taking care of the ball, Wooldridge said.

"What we concern ourselves with when we play these teams in our league is that we are going to play a good basketball game," he said. "That we're going to play to our capabilities and never underachieve and work to overachieve. If that translates into a win, than that's a great thing."

Foul trouble haunted K-State in the teams' first meeting this season, an 81-64 loss on Jan. 18.

Pervis Pasco played only 17 minutes before collecting his fifth foul, sitting out nearly the entire first half. Freshman Marques Hayden also fouled out against the Jayhawks, playing in only 22 minutes.

"It's going to be important," forward Matt Siebrandt said. "It could have been a whole different game if we hadn't been in foul trouble, so it's important that everybody stays out of foul trouble, and we'll be able to give them the best shot we've got."

The St. Louis Cardinals on Thursday signed left-hander Rick Ankiel, who missed all of last season with an elbow injury, to a one-year contract.

Ankiel will be paid $400,000 if he makes the major league roster and $320,000 if he lands in the minors. He's expected to compete for a bullpen spot, meant to lessen the pressure on a pitcher plagued with wildness, when the team reports to spring training next Friday.

Bud Selig danced around questions about Pete Rose on Thursday, refusing to say whether he was considering lifting the permanent ban agreed to by the career hits leader 14 years ago.

The baseball commissioner, speaking at the Bay area's annual Fox Sports Net baseball luncheon, reiterated how difficult this case is for him considering his longtime friendship with the late A. Bartlett Giamatti, the commissioner who forced Rose to agree to the lifetime ban.

David Justice is going through with his decision to retire.

The outfielder said after Oakland's playoff loss to Minnesota that he intended to quit baseball. On Thursday, he reiterated his playing days are over.

Cats must watch for 2 phases of Hawk play to secure win

JOEL REICHENBERGER

At first, I didn't know what to think about tomorrow's game between K-State and Kansas.

Things are never predictable when hordes of Jayhawks holding hands come skipping into town.

Maybe it's the funny smelling stuff they smoke on the way, or perhaps it's how their daddies' BMWs clog Anderson Avenue and Claflin Road. Either way, nothing is predictable.

The problem with KU, besides the obvious ones, is fairly simple. They are ridiculously good. When KU plays, it seems they play with two different speeds. There's "fast," which K-State saw for most of the game on Jan. 18.

The Cats can handle fast. K-State kept pace most of the game with the Hawks.

But then KU has "turbo-hippy" speed. Perfected on Massachusetts Street in Lawrence, "turbo-hippy" speed set K-State in its 15-0 grave before it even got on the board.

When KU guard Kirk Hinrich and forward Nick Collison are firing together, the Jayhawks are nearly impossible to stop. Those two, coupled with a worthy supporting cast of Keith Langford, Aaron Miles and Jeff Graves, make for a fantastic starting five.

That said, I think K-State will win.

It will all start with the referee's whistle. The Cats need to force early foul trouble, just like they did against Oklahoma. OU's big men got in trouble and spent critical moments on the bench.

The first target should be Graves. When he first entered the starting lineup, no one thought much of Graves, but his solid play has changed many opinions.

Fortunately for the Cats, he is prone to the hack. He has sat out the end of several key games and has to be lured into a similar situation on Saturday.

It couldn't hurt to pile up a couple fouls on Hinrich and

Wildcats must put forth best efforts against Lady Bears for 1st win in Waco

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Twenty minutes of execution might have been enough to down Missouri on Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum, but Coach Deb Patterson isn't counting on that sort of effort to get her Wildcats a road win this weekend.

Instead, K-State will likely need a complete performance Saturday when the No. 5 Wildcats (20-2, 7-1) travel to Waco, Texas, to square off against Baylor (15-5, 4-4).

"We better know who we are, we better be prepared to bring it," Patterson said, "and we're going to have to have the best from everyone."

Cats solidify defense with cornerbacks

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's M.O. has always been defense.

So it wasn't ironic when Coach Bill Snyder announced the signing of 19 players on Wednesday – 12 of them on defense.

But that doesn't mean they'll stay on that side of the ball.

"There are a lot of young guys in this class that have dual capabilities," Snyder said. "Most of them, you see them as wide receiver, slash defensive back, slash kick returner – and they are.

"It's a group that runs pretty well and has athletic ability. It's not just one. There's five or six that can do it."

Seven of Snyder's 19 signees are defensive backs, as K-State attempts to fill the vacancy left by senior Terence Newman. It didn't take Snyder looking far and wide to find the possible replacements, either. He found them in his own back yard.

Garden City Community College standouts Corey Reddick and Cedrick Williams have already joined the team and will participate in spring drills, Snyder said.

He said he hopes that by being around the program for a semester the duo will have a better understanding of the defense by the time fall rolls around.

"They're getting along quite well from what I see and understand," Snyder said. "It will be important for them in the spring to learn and understand the system.

"They are athletic enough to contribute," he said. "They just need to learn what's going on."

After solidifying a depleted secondary, Snyder then turned to K-State's signature, stopping the run.

With the exit of linebacker Terry Pierce to the NFL Draft, Snyder said it was important to find solid replacements.

"You have to hope for the best and prepare for the worst," he said, "not that him leaving was the worst, but we knew we had to have ourselves covered."

K-State covered itself by signing two junior college linebackers, most notable for Marvin Simmons from Compton (Calif.) College.

Co-defensive coordinator Bret Bielema said it is possible Simmons could make an immediate impact for the Wildcats.

"Marvin comes with a number of accolades," Bielema said. "How good he will be will obviously depend on what he does on the field for us."

Such will be the case in every situation, Snyder said. The point is not to always get players that will see the field next year, he said. The point is to continue building a program that will be competitive in the future.

Signing to focus on linemen, QB

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Call it a concern.

Call it an issue. Call it anything you want. The fact is, any successful Division-I football program is going to lose seniors to eligibility and talent to the NFL.

That fact leaves teams with holes to fill, usually on both sides of the ball, and K-State is no exception to the rule.

But some teams have more issues to address than others. Coach Bill Snyder's Wildcats, particularly on offense, isn't a team with many.

Nonetheless, the Wildcat coach said linemen were of primary concern.

"The issue was not having a whole lot of scholarships to deal with," Snyder said. "We had to be pretty precise with regard to what our immediate needs were.

"That doesn't mean we met every need we have, but I think our immediate needs were obvious. We needed a corner, we needed on offensive tackle, a linebacker, and we needed a down lineman."

Still, every need can't always be filled.

Snyder said that was the case with the search for new role players on the offensive front.

"I would have liked to take additional offensive linemen," he said.

But the Cats did find some offensive lineman. Two, Jon Beuthin (6-foot-6, 265 pounds) and Logan Robinson (6-foot-9, 315 pounds), are already enrolled at K-State and will receive redshirts.

K-State's third recruit on the line is 6-foot-7, 320-pound Travis Triplett. Triplett, an honorable mention All-American transfer from Dodge City (Kan.) Community College, will be expected to make a more immediate effect than Beuthin or Robinson.

Snyder added that the line wasn't the Wildcats' lone area of emphasis on offensive recruiting this offseason.

"I wasn't overly concerned, as everybody seems to be," Snyder said, "but we would have taken a freshman quarterback if we could have gotten the right one. We just didn't get the right one."

K-State did retain the services of 6-foot-3, 205-pound Allen Webb. However Webb, a redshirt-freshman transfer from Indiana, provides young talent for the Wildcats.

Snyder said Webb, rated No. 23 among dual-threat quarterbacks in 2002 by Rivals.com, will have time to grow in the Wildcat program.

"Having to sit for a year and then get three years is like having a freshman," he said. "He is that so we're pleased to have him."

WOMEN | Execution key for Cats weekend victory

team," sophomore Kendra Wecker said, "and playing them on the road is going to be tough."

Tough might be an understatement when it comes to road games in Waco.

K-State is winless in three tries at the Ferrell Center, although the Wildcats own a one-game edge in the series history, 6-5, and wins in four of the teams' last six meetings.

More impressive is Baylor's home record this season. The Lady Bears have dropped just one of 12 games at home.

The Baylor offense keys on four players averaging double-digits in points, led by sophomore Steffanie Blackmon (18 ppg).

Blackmon's post comrades, freshman Sophia Young (12.2 ppg) and junior Dionne Brown (10.4 ppg), pull their weight in the Baylor offense as well.

On the perimeter, junior Jessika Stratton pitches in 10.1 points per contest and connects at a 50-percent (24-of-48) clip from three-point range.

K-State will counter with offensive firepower of its own.

Wecker leads the Big 12 in scoring average at 20.0 per game.

Junior Nicole Ohlde will also battle for points and rebounds in the paint.

But stats aside, it all comes down to execution for the Wildcats, Patterson said, as K-State vies for its third-straight win Saturday afternoon to stay in a three-way tie with Texas and Texas Tech for the Big 12 lead.

"It's going to be an incredibly challenging game," Patterson said. "We have to understand that on the road, and against a team like this and probably in front of a crowd that will number 9- or 10,000, we better bring a very tight game."

KU | Slowing Kansas' transition offense vital for win

The Jayhawks bring the conference's highest-scoring offense at 85.5 points a game along with two of the top-five scorers in the Big 12 in Nick Collison and Kirk Hinrich.

After spotting Kansas a 15-0 lead in the first matchup this season, K-State must slow down the Jayhawks' transition offense, junior Jarrett Hart said.

"We just have to be there in front of them," he said. "They're going to come fast every possession. We just have to be there and support each other. That's been the thing we've been working on, and that's been the theme all week: Just playing together. They might beat the first-line of defense, but the second-line of defense has to be there and be ready to go.

"We're going to have to make sure we get back in transition and try to get them in a half-court set – that's probably the most important thing. It's going to be important for us to try and counter that."

RECRUITING SEASON

New Pacino film contains good script, enough twists to entertain audiences

"THE RECRUIT"
★★★½☆
Movie review by JJ Duncan

"The Recruit" isn't anything new to fans of the spy-versus-spy genre, but Al Pacino and Colin Farrell make the movie almost believable.

Nothing is particularly fetching about the movie itself. The no-frills directing and cinematography concentrate on the actors. And the script is a pretty good take on the double-agent spy movie, with just enough twists and surprises to keep an audience interested without alienating them.

It's a safe film.

Farrell is James Clayton, a hotshot programmer at MIT poised for a well-paid life in the computer industry when he is visited by CIA recruiter Walter Burke (Pacino).

Burke offers him a life of excitement as a real life James Bond, and pretty soon, Clayton is at the top of his class at a CIA training camp known as The Farm.

After a couple of plot twists, Clayton finds himself operating under Burke as a non-official cover agent or NOC. And, of course, his target is Layla (Bridget Moynahan, "The Sum of All Fears") the hot girl he wanted back in training who turns out to be an al-Qaeda sleeper agent.

So what will the young agent do when he's forced to pit his feelings for someone against the job he's been trained to do? Find out next time, same Bat time, same Bat channel. From there, things get pretty predictable until a well-written ending.

So why would you want to see "The Recruit" instead of renting "The Bourne Identity" or "Spy Games"?

That's where Pacino and Farrell come in. Pair up Pacino, an audience favorite, with that hot up-and-coming, poor-man's-Brad-Pitt, Colin Farrell.

Then, add a patriotic-ish script released during a time when the nation seems poised for war. What have you got? A license to print cash.

The movie isn't bad. If you like movies about espionage and intrigue, you'll like it.

But if you're just a little too cynical for this movie right now, "Confessions of a Dangerous Mind" at least lets you laugh at the CIA.

New Zwan album brings back smashing sound of Pumpkins

"MARY STAR OF THE SEA"
Album review by Matthew Webber

Perhaps in the King James Iha version of the Bible, the Messiah is a man who does unto guitar players as he would have them do unto him.

In the Billy Corgan version, Christ is a bald control freak who so loved the world that he gave his only begotten songs.

When Corgan broke up the Smashing Pumpkins, few believed he was ending his relationship with his guitar.

The most prolific songwriter of 1990s alternative rock released more b-sides than some of his peers released singles.

He wore his wounds not on his sleeve, but in his palms and feet. Carrying his guitar on his back like a cross, he shouted his Siamese dreams and shattered his Mellon Collie with melody.

For millions of fans and critics, it was impossible not to worship him. He was the last alternative rock star to aspire to such blasphemy.

We knew he would return.

The debut album from his new band, Zwan, "Mary Star of the Sea," is the gospel according to Corgan. On the album's first track, "Lyric," his first words to his apostles are, "Here comes my faith to carry me on," and he sounds like a believer in himself.

The first words of Zwan's first single, "Honestly," are, "I believe, I believe, I believe" – and I believe Zwan might be the fiercest rock band you'll see on MTV.

Some songwriters write more poetic lyrics. Some guitar players play with more precision. Most singers sing with more pleasing voices.

www.kstatecollegian.com
See another staffer's point of view on the eCollegian.

But I can't think of a bandleader who writes, plays and sings with more passion.

It's impossible not to compare "Mary Star of the Sea" with Corgan's Pumpkins corpus.

We remember that shriek. We remember the skull-pummeling syncopation of drummer Jimmy Chamberlin, the only former Pumpkin whom Corgan retained.

We remember those songs, those pop rocks that melt in your ears.

Is "Mary Star of the Sea" as timeless as "Siamese Dream," as ambitious as "Mellon Collie and the Infinite Sadness," as loud as "Machina: The Machines of God"? No. A few songs lack tension, and you won't find another "Today" or "1979."

Is the album as ephemeral, trifling and weak as whatever song you just heard on the radio?

It depends on whether you've accepted Corgan as your rock and roll savior.

As he sings on "Baby Let's Rock!": "Baby, I'm the greatest thing you've got," I, for one, believe him. Corgan might look like a vampiric Charlie Brown, but he still rocks out like Schroeder on meth.

Baby, Zwan rocks. Honestly.

WAL-MART | Supercenter allowed to impose tax

a few minor things by Dec. 31, but usage of the road will be possible," he said. "Wal-Mart has been pushing pretty hard to have their store open by Oct. 15, and we've been working really hard to get that done."

City Manager Ron Fehr said that after construction is complete, total traffic improvements for the Transportation Development District (TDD) will cost $4,231,750.

But with a statewide budget crisis and cuts throughout the city, the question arises as to who will pay for the large project.

Fehr said the city will have very little out-of-pocket cost since city commissioners approved the first reading of an ordinance Tuesday night that will authorize Wal-Mart and its property as a TDD.

He said the TDD distinction will be the first in Kansas since its approval in the state legislature last session.

"Without this TDD distinction, the project probably wouldn't continue," he said. "With a pre-existing traffic problem, it would be difficult for the city to come up with funds for improvements otherwise."

Fehr said the transportation project is divided into two areas, the McCall Road improvements and the remaining street improvements, including Bluemont Avenue, Frontage Road, Hayes Drive and Tuttle Creek Boulevard.

Sharing expenses

Through its new distinction, Wal-Mart will be allowed to impose a half-cent excise tax on retail sales and services within the store in order to pay for all street improvements, excluding McCall Road.

"This is a new process," Fehr said.

"No other businesses will be affected by this except Wal-Mart."

Fehr said the half-cent increase won't be too noticeable.

"Currently, Pottawatomie County doesn't have a sales tax, whereas Riley has a one-cent tax," he said. "Even imposing a half-cent sales tax, Wal-Mart would still be a half-cent lower than, say, the mall."

Although there may be objections to the increase in sales tax, Fehr said this case is different.

"Some who have objected to this have said it runs cross to the way sales taxes are imposed, but other sales taxes are approved by voters," he said.

"It isn't a blanket proposal. The public isn't forced to shop at Wal-Mart. That is why it's not a constitutional issue."

Fehr said Wal-Mart, Pottawatomie County and the city will share expenses for improvements to McCall Road.

"To move the project forward, back in December, the Commission approved a predevelopment agreement to pay one-fourth of the cost, or $250,000, for a five-lane widening of McCall Road, with Wal-Mart agreeing to half the costs and Pottawatomie County agreeing to one-fourth of the cost," he said.

However, as part of the agreement, Wal-Mart will buy $1,150,000 in city land for a parking area.

Fehr said this money could offset expenses incurred by the city to help pay for design fees, the moving of the drainage site and the city's share of McCall Road improvements.

BUSH | President calls on allies to help disarm Iraq

resolution for war."

In Baghdad, an Iraqi arms expert submitted to a private interview with U.N. weapons inspectors, the first sign of cooperation in that area.

Bush ticked off a series of accusations that Powell had lodged on Wednesday in the U.N. Security Council, including authorization by Saddam to his lieutenants to use chemical weapons.

"Saddam Hussein was given a final chance," Bush said, referring to the resolution approved unanimously in November by the Security Council that launched new U.N. inspections. "He is throwing that chance away," the president said.

Pointedly, Bush did not renew past appeals to Saddam to reveal the chemical and biological weapons and the nuclear and missile programs the United States contends Iraq has.

In Paris, French President Jacques Chirac said that France's position had not been changed by Powell's presentation at the United Nations.

"We refuse to think that war is inevitable," Chirac said through a spokesman. The evidence furnished by Powell "justifies continued work by the United Nations weapons inspectors. Iraq must answer their questions and cooperate more actively," the French president said.

In London, British Prime Minister Tony Blair acknowledged he could have trouble persuading many Britons to support a war against Iraq unless the idea first won U.N. approval.

But Blair also said that if Iraq refuses to cooperate with the weapons inspectors, and one of the five Security Council members with veto powers tries to block a vote authorizing a military response, his government may have no choice but to participate in a U.S.-led attack.

Survey: students spend less time studying

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This year's freshman class studied less in high school than high school seniors have in the past 37 years, a study said.

According to a study conducted by the Higher Education Research Institute at UCLA's Graduate School of Education and Information Studies, a record number of high school seniors spent less than six hours doing homework. Also, 15.9 percent reported spending less than one hour studying per week.

Still, 45 percent of incoming freshmen at four-year colleges reported getting an A average in high school.

Have the lack of study habits carried over into college?

Allie Greene, sophomore in open-option and resident at Ford Hall, said no.

"I feel like I study more now than I did in high school," Greene said. "I study harder for tests. The work's harder and more of a challenge, but it's stuff I will use more."

On the contrary, Amy Rundle, freshman in photography and resident at Boyd Hall, said she actually does less studying now than she did in high school.

"I am taking art classes, so I do a lot of projects rather than studying," Rundle said.

"I figure if I go to class and I listen, that should be enough."

The school work in high school was a lot different than what's assigned in college, Greene said.

"It's not busy work anymore. It's not just assigned for points," she said. "Now they focus more on what you know, not just whether or not you have something to do."

Scheduling is also a lot different in college, Rundle said.

"Everything's later, and I feel like I don't have time to do anything because I always have something to do," she said. "Meetings start at 9:30 instead of 7, and instead of going to bed at 10, I go to bed at 1. Everything is shifted."

Jeremy Koci, resident assistant for Goodnow Hall, said residence halls tend to be more geared to studying.

"The residence halls don't have a lot of distractions. Everyone you live with is a student," he said.

Students must be doing what they need to do to keep their grades high enough to be able to stay in school, because the residence halls have a good rate of return for spring semesters, Koci said.

Rundle agreed that the residence halls have a more scholastic atmosphere.

"When you live by yourself, you have less accountability. There aren't people always there to ask you why you aren't studying or weren't at class," she said.

Judy Lynch, director of the Academic Assistance Center, said freshmen don't study enough.

"Freshman year is a crucial time for determining whether or not students will graduate," Lynch said.

"We need to teach them to study, and then how much is needed."

The Academic Assistance Center offers many options for those seeking help with studying or school work in general, Lynch said.

"Students can apply for a tutor in Holton 101," she said. "We also offer walk-in tutoring at the Kramer and Derby complexes in more critical areas like math and science."

Success only comes if you seek it out, Lynch said.

"Successful students know how to access resources, and K-State has a ton of them," she said.

"It's a challenge to freshmen to go out and find them, and then figure out that it's the good students who are taking advantage of them."

Tips for effective studying:

- ❒ Plan two study hours for every hour you spend in class.
- ❒ Study difficult (or boring) subjects first.
- ❒ Avoid scheduling marathon study sessions.
- ❒ Be aware of your best time of day.
- ❒ Use waiting time.
- ❒ Use a regular study area.
- ❒ Pay attention to your attention.
- ❒ Agree with roommates about study time.
- ❒ Avoid noise distractions.
- ❒ Notice how others misuse your time.
- ❒ Get off the phone.
- ❒ Learn to say no.
- ❒ Hang a "Do Not Disturb!" sign on your door.

METZ | Fort Riley commander relinquishes duties

has been proud of the men he commanded, especially as he has read letters in his office from Americans thanking soldiers for their service.

"I have to close the door because great tears roll down my cheeks," he said. "There is no way a commanding general can express to his soldiers the pride he has."

Now command of Fort Riley lies in the hands of interim commanding general, Frank Helmick.

Helmick has served at Fort Riley since August 2002 as assistant division commander for maneuver. He was unavailable for comment.

Metz's next step, Fort Hood, provides an even greater challenge.

"The 4th Infantry Division is loading equipment," Metz said. "Those will continue because there is a long enough list and enough work to do that that will continue for a while."

Major Kevin West, who has worked closely with Metz, said he knows he is the right man for the job.

"He empowers his subordinates," West said. "He provides a vision of what he wants and gives them the latitude to execute."

Lt. Gen. Joseph Inge praised Metz and his wife Pam for the sacrifices they have made for the good of Fort Riley and surrounding communities.

"We're here today to say farewell to Tom and Pam Metz, a soldier and spouse who dedicated all their lives to committing and serving the United States Army.

"We wish you Godspeed and God's blessing as you leave for your new post."

COLUMN | Cats will step up to Hawks' challenge

Collison, either.

If any of those players have to spend time on the bench, K-State's chances skyrocket.

KU's bench is terrible, and K-State needs to find a way to exploit it.

At the same time, the Cats need to avoid foul trouble themselves.

In Lawrence, Pervis Pasco got into trouble early and never became a factor.

Against OU, Gilison DeJesus fouled out early and when the Cats reached the end of the game, they lacked the punch DeJesus can provide.

K-State will need both those guys, along with everyone else in the lineup to pull out the upset.

Guard Tim Ellis will also have to come up big. He will likely line up against the weakest of the Lawrence five, Langford.

That is a matchup the Cats need to win.

Both can shoot the three-pointer, but Ellis might have a step on Langford, and he needs to exploit it.

Senior Matt Siebrandt could also prove a decisive factor.

He'll go against Graves, who's not known for being the smartest chicken in the coop.

If Siebrandt can get his sweet, lefty hook going, Graves could get so confused that he sits down and cries at half court.

Maybe the best thing K-State has going for it is Bramlage Coliseum.

No doubt there will be plenty of giggling from the KU fans, but there will be plenty of purple on hand as well. Bramlage is the Cats' home, and when they face the Jayhawks there, amazing stuff tends to happen.

Two years ago, K-State had a great shot at the upset. With only a few seconds left before half, Larry Reid laid a move at the top of the key that broke pretty-boy Jeff Boschee's ankles. Then he drove the lane and drilled a 15-footer to bring the Cats within two at intermission.

The fans went wild, but K-State couldn't hang onto the momentum, and KU won by a dozen.

Last year, with his team playing disheartened and the referees wearing blue and red "Beak 'em Hawks" undies, Coach Jim Wooldridge set things straight. After a particularly terrible call, he stormed the court on a mission. He got in the face of a referee and screamed until he got a technical foul. He immediately went to the next referee and screamed until he drew his second technical. Officially thrown out of the game, Wooldridge was not one to leave a job undone. He tracked down the final ref and made sure he got the same berating as his cohorts.

It was a thing of beauty, and the team responded. The Cats battled back and fought to the end, even though they couldn't make a game of it.

K-State can't afford to fall behind Saturday, and they won't. This team can play unbelievable ball at home, and Saturday will be a coming-out party – albeit not the kind the Jayhawks are used to.

Now everyone knock on wood and show up ready to scream.

NATO planning to protect Turkey

By Paul Ames
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium – Stepping up pressure to end three weeks of stalling, NATO Secretary-General Lord Robertson gave France, Germany and Belgium until Monday to decide whether to stop blocking a U.S. request for the alliance to protect Turkey in case of war with Iraq.

Under a so-called "silence procedure" agreed upon Thursday, military planning would begin automatically to deploy early warning planes, missile-interceptor batteries and anti-germ warfare units to Turkey – unless any of the allies raises an objection by 10 a.m. Monday.

"There is continuing disagreement on the timing issue ... but I am confident that we will reach a decision early next week," Robertson told reporters after a heated meeting of ambassadors from the 19 nations.

The deadline cranks up pressure on the French, Germans and Belgians, who argued it was premature to start the military planning while U.N. efforts to avert war continued.

The other 16 allies had hoped an appeal for help from Turkey and Secretary of State Colin Powell's indictment of Iraq's arms programs at the United Nations on Wednesday would have swayed the holdouts, but again they forced a delay of the decision.

Robertson stressed there "is complete agreement on the substance" of the measures to defend Turkey, and differences only concerned the timing of a decision to order military experts to begin planning.

"NATO's solidarity with Turkey is not in doubt," Robertson insisted. The continued objections from the three nations came despite a dilution of the original list of possible support measures by NATO in an eventual war that was put forward by the U.S.

Bush: Saddam deceiving U.N.

By Will Lester
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W.Va. – President Bush said Sunday that Iraq has fooled the world for more than a decade about its banned weapons and the United Nations now faces "a moment of truth" in disarming Saddam Hussein.

"It is clear that not only is Saddam Hussein deceiving, it is clear he's not disarming. And so you'll see us over the next short period of time working with friends and allies and the United Nations to bring that body along," Bush told congressional Republicans at a policy conference.

The Iraqi leader "wants the world to think that hide-and-seek is a game that we should play. And it's over," Bush said.

The president spoke as chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix said in Baghdad that he saw a beginning of Iraq's understanding that it must seriously observe U.N. demands for disarmament. U.N. nuclear chief Mohamed ElBaradei said he expected the Security Council to give the inspectors more time "as long as we are registering good progress."

Asked later about Blix's statement, White House spokesman Ari Flesicher said: "Given the fact that Saddam Hussein is not disarming, time is running out."

Blix and ElBaradei are to make their next report to the U.N. Security Council on Friday. That could be pivotal toward determining whether the United States should launch military action against Iraq.

In his speech, given while the inspectors held a televised news conference from Iraq, Bush said, "It's a

Frances Bryant of Pilgrim Baptist Church makes dessert while her children, Renee, 12, and Rejoyce, 8, watch. The family and other volunteers from their church prepare dinner every second Sunday at First Congregational Church United Church of Christ on Poyntz Ave. Different churches and groups team up to make a meal open to the public every Sunday at 5:15 p.m.

Church serves Sunday dinner as service to community, needy

For Frances Bryant, the smiles were enough.

"Just seeing the expression on the guests' faces as they come through the line." Bryant, Ogden resident, said. "My, that is a wonderful feeling. Those smiles ... that is all I need to see."

And she sees them every time she volunteers at the First Congregational Church United Church of Christ's free Sunday dinner.

The dinner, coined "Second Helping" by one of the guests, feeds about 15-25 people every Sunday, Melissa Jones, co-coordinator, said. Each guest receives a full-course meal and paper sack with breakfast and lunch items for the following day.

Come to dinner

- What: Sunday Dinner
- Where: First Congregational Church United Church of Christ, 700 Poyntz Avenue
- When: 5:15 Sunday evening
- Who: Anyone

"Four years ago when the program originated it was thought we would mainly serve the homeless," Jones said. "Now the guests are a little bit more varied. They are functionally homeless, people that are somewhat isolated from the community or even families where the money is just a little tight this week. We welcome anyone."

The church members rely on donations, the Flint Hills Breadbasket and volunteers from Gamma Omicron, K-State Key Club, Wamego Squires and Pilgrim Baptist Church to keep the program going.

Bryant, who is from Pilgrim Baptist Church, was one of five volunteers Sunday who helped cook, serve and clean up. The work, she says, is nothing compared to what she gains from the experience.

Eight-year-old Rejoyce Bryant of Pilgrim Baptist Church watches her sister pour water to make lemonade for a dinner held at First Congregational Church United Church of Christ on Sunday afternoon.

"I just really enjoy it," she said.

"The people who come are so happy to see you. That warm feeling you get when you see them happy is what it is all about. It is wonderful."

Bryant's daughters, Renee, 12, and Rejoyce, 8, joined their mother and other church members volunteering at the dinner.

"It was fun knowing we could help people," Renee said.

And for her sister, it was knowing the people were "nice and friendly and glad we were there."

Jones said the project is one of the church's main missions because it brings a mix of people together into one setting.

"I think that is a healthy thing," she said. "Helping the guest is an important way of expressing unconditional acceptance."

INS regulation requires foreign visitors to register

K-State students say registration process is unconstitutional

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Imagine skipping class to go to Kansas City, or if you'd like, Wichita. While for some, this scenario may bring visions of shopping, good restaurants and fun – for others, it means a "humiliating and unpleasant" experience.

That is how Altaf Karim, graduate student in physics and president of the Pakistani Students Association, described the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service registration process, in which all temporary foreign visitors from 25 countries in the Middle East must report to the nearest INS office to be photographed, fingerprinted and interviewed.

The process is part of the third phase of the National Security Entry-Exit Registration System, a program resulting from response to the Sept. 11 attacks.

Mike Heston, director of the Kansas City district of INS, said the program is set up to account for the entry and exit of all non-immigrants.

He said that beginning Sept. 11, 2002, the government selected the first five countries for registration and added the others thereafter. When people from the selected countries arrive in the United States, they are interviewed and basic data such as fingerprints, photos, and destination is collected from them.

These people are required to report to the nearest INS office 30 days later, where they are asked more detailed questions about their living situations, and if they have enrolled in school or reported to their jobs. After a year, they are interviewed again, Heston said.

Also, people from the selected countries who were in the United States prior to Sept. 11 must report to INS to register and will be asked to return a year later for more interviews.

"There is no difference in the data that we're collecting from the groups," Heston

Students prepare to meet with officials for State Education Day

Legislators to meet with students from Regents universities

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nine K-State students along with other students from Board of Regents universities will meet with Kansas legislators Tuesday for the Kansas State Education Day in Topeka.

During the event, two students from different universities will visit with each legislator for about ten minutes.

Appointments have been confirmed with 132 senators and representatives from the state, Julie Quackenbush, governmental relations chair, said.

In preparation for the event, student legislative directors from the six universities prepared an informational pamphlet for participating individuals.

Topics include the effects of tuition raises and a plea to raise financial aid in proportion to the increase, said Jeremy Stohs, senior in political science and student senator.

"A lot of times, K-State students are hesitant to express their feelings to elected officials," he said. "State Education Day makes them more comfortable and gives them a reason to do that."

In addition, Quakenbush said it was vital to form relationships with the leaders of Kansas.

"It's important that we, as a university and as a family, stay in the forefront of legislators' minds," she said. "Whether or not there was a budget crisis, it's important to establish a connection with people representing us."

Education day

- Members of Student Senate are meeting with state legislators Tuesday from 7 a.m. to 4 p.m. for State Education Day in Topeka.

The reason Stohs decided to participate was simple – he said he wanted to discuss K-State's tuition increases with state legislators.

Stohs said the majority of students only pay for about one-third of their actual education costs. The rest of that money comes from the state of Kansas.

"It's essential that we as students work hard to ensure that the money continues to flow, and that it flows in the right direction," he said.

David McCandless, governmental relations director, said he also is anxious to tell legislators K-State's story.

"We're hanging by a string here," he said. "If we have another year of cuts, it would be disastrous to the university.

"The university would have to raise tuition again and it would be dangerous to the state to limit access to a college education like that."

Quakenbush said participating in the event helps both the students and the legislators to understand and voice certain concerns.

"One standpoint is that it helps representatives to better represent their constituents," she said. "It gives them a reason to support higher education with both time and funding.

"I think for students, it helps them to feel they are in touch with the people they helped to elect and represent them. It helps them to understand where state officials are coming from and what they have to work with as far as finances and other efforts go."

Stohs said State Education Day is important to be involved in, which is why this is his fourth consecutive year to participate.

"State Education Day is the one designated day out of the legislative session that university students have the opportunity of showing, in mass, that we are a significant interest in this state," Stohs said.

"The presence of so many talented students is hard to ignore."

Travolta plans to star in next Disney feature

A Disney movie starring John Travolta is set to begin filming in Baltimore next month.

"Ladder 49" could be the biggest feature film ever made in the city, said Baltimore movie maven Jed Dietz, head of the Maryland Film Festival and founder of the Producers Club of Maryland.

Baltimore was chosen over several other cities, including Toronto and Philadelphia, to be the primary location for the thriller. Mayor Martin O'Malley helped campaign to win the movie.

The movie, which also stars Joaquin Phoenix, is the story of a veteran firefighter who looks back over his professional life, heroic career and family life while trapped in a deadly blaze.

"It is a big production, potentially one of the biggest we've ever had," Dietz said. "It is a great tribute to Baltimore that what (director Jay Russell) saw was authentic."

Ventura to host cable show

Former Minnesota Gov. Jesse Ventura will be paid a reported $2 million per year to host a talk show on cable channel MSNBC.

Ventura confirmed his plans during an appearance on NBC's "Tonight" show Thursday. It remained unclear when Ventura's show would begin, but he is expected to get a prime-time slot.

"People just love this guy," MSNBC President Erik Sorenson told The New York Times, which credited the salary to unidentified network officials.

"He has some kind of connection to the average guy."

MSNBC has been struggling among the cable news networks behind Fox News Channel and CNN. Where hard news once predominated, all three now have nighttime lineups stocked with colorful personalities.

Pinocchio to be re-released in Italian

Actor and director Roberto Benigni's film "Pinocchio" has found its voice – and it's in Italian.

The $35 million movie, shot in Italian but dubbed into English for U.S. audiences, flopped at the box office over the December holidays, grossing less than $4 million.

Now Miramax has re-released the film at theaters in New York and Los Angeles in Italian, with English subtitles.

The producers have said Benigni, who stars as the wooden puppet, struggled with English. Just weeks before the original release, another actor was brought in to dub Benigni's dialogue. Many reviewers slammed the movie because the words poorly matched the actor's lip movements on screen.

Benigni, 50, is best known for "Life is Beautiful," which played to U.S. audiences in Italian with subtitles. It won the 1999 Oscar for best foreign language film. A second version dubbed in English was not as successful.

Ebert recovering from papillary surgery

Film critic Roger Ebert is recuperating from follow-up surgery for papillary cancer, a common and curable type of thyroid cancer.

The 60-year-old movie reviewer for the Chicago Sun-Times and television audiences underwent the procedure Thursday at Northwestern Memorial Hospital.

"It went very successfully," a hospital spokeswoman said.

A year ago, doctors removed Ebert's thyroid gland and selected lymph nodes in his neck. They said at the time that Ebert was expected to make a complete recovery.

Ebert said in a statement Friday that he would attend screenings on Monday and would cover the Oscar nominations on Tuesday.

"In other words," he said, "it's business as usual."

Campbell feuds with British press

Supermodel Naomi Campbell is seeking a ruling by the House of Lords in her legal battle with a British newspaper over its reporting about her drug problem.

Campbell asked for permission to challenge a ruling by Britain's Court of Appeal, which overturned a lower court decision against the paper, the Daily Mirror.

Illustration by Adam Hayes | COLLEGIAN

The 32-year-old British model objected to a February 2001 article that reported her drug addiction and included a photograph of her leaving a Narcotics Anonymous meeting in London.

Last March, the High Court upheld her claim of a breach of confidentiality, awarded her $5,710 in damages and ordered the Daily Mirror to pay her legal costs.

But the paper appealed and won a reversal of the judgment. The appeals court said Campbell lied by saying that, unlike other models, she didn't take drugs, stimulants or tranquilizers.

A spokesman for Campbell's law firm, Schilling & Lom, said Friday that the model has asked for permission to appeal the ruling to the Law Lords, which could overturn the Court of Appeal.

The owner of the Daily Mirror, the Mirror Group, said through a spokeswoman: "We have been asked to lodge any objections (to the appeal) by Feb. 18, which we will be doing."

Eminem to perform only one U.S. concert

Superstar rapper Eminem plans only one U.S. concert this year and it will be in his hometown of Detroit.

Also appearing at the July 12 show at the new downtown football stadium will be Missy Elliott and 50 Cent.

"His entire North American tour takes place at Ford Field," Rick Franks of Clear Channel Entertainment told the Detroit Free Press. "We look at it as the highlight of the summer."

Metallica also plans to play in July at Ford Field, which hosted the Rolling Stones in October and holds about 45,000 people for concerts.

Durst labels Spears as "out of control"

Limp Bizkit lead singer Fred Durst said that despite his recent outpourings of affection for Britney Spears, her life is too "out of control" for him to date her.

Durst posted several romantic messages on his band's Web site last month about the pop singer.

The 32-year-old said that when he met Spears, he thought,

"Wow, this is just a very sweet Southern girl" he told "Access Hollywood" for an interview airing Monday.

"But actually, she has a life like Michael Jackson. It's, like, out of control."

Spears, 21, has never acknowledged a relationship with Durst. Her spokeswoman had no comment on his remarks Friday.

Durst said he feels bad for Spears, who dated 'N Sync singer Justin Timberlake for several years and recently has been linked to actor Colin Farrell.

"We're not enemies, man, I just don't want to talk to her," Durst said.

"I just chose not to talk to her anymore."

STD screening important for maintaining health

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Whether it's because of suspicious symptoms or for peace of mind, at some point, sexually active students might decide it's time to check for sexually transmitted diseases.

"A lot of people just want to check to be checked, and some people want to check because they've found out a partner has been unfaithful. I hear that a lot," said Dr. Wendy Blank, director of the Women's Clinic at Lafene Health Center.

Dr. Jay Reppert, medical director of Lafene, said men often have specific symptoms they are worried about.

"It's not uncommon for men to call for a visit about symptoms," he said.

"Probably more of the men I see have symptoms such as discomfort during urination."

While being screened for STDs is important, Blank said not everything can be found through a blood test since certain diseases require specific testing procedures.

Through one blood test, a patient can be screened for human immunodeficiency virus (HIV), syphilis and Hepatitis B.

Gonorrhea and chlamydia are tested for in men through a urine test, and in women through a pelvic examination. Genital herpes and human papillomavirus (HPV, also known as genital warts) are often diagnosed from visible symptoms, Blank said.

"A common misperception is that I can go in and have one blood test done, and I can be checked for every STD out there," she said.

"That's not the case. So the first thing we do is some education about the most common sexually transmitted diseases, which ones can be screened for, and what kinds of symptoms they will have with ones that they can't be tested for."

Blank said that when she educates patients, she often recommends being vaccinated for Hepatitis B, since it is the only STD for which there is a vaccination.

The vaccination includes a regimen of three shots that cost $25 each taken within a six months period.

Another frequent concern of students being tested for STDs is that of privacy.

Patients who do not want the screening bill sent to their regular insurance provider – often because the policy is in a parent's name – can make preparations to pay the bill themselves through Lafene's business office, Reppert said.

As for the results of the tests, the doctor is allowed to disclose them only to the patient, Reppert said.

"It's important to know that parents and other parties have no access to any of these records unless the patient explicitly gives them permission," he said.

Despite the burgeoning number of sexual health classes in public schools, Reppert said some people still believe that if they use a condom, they will be safe from all sexually transmitted diseases.

While condoms are the most effective way to prevent infection of HIV, gonorrhea, hepatitis B, syphilis, chlamydia and trichomoniasis, they are not 100 percent effective.

Condoms also do little to prevent the contraction of genital warts and genital herpes, Reppert said.

These and other issues about STD prevention will be addressed this week by members of S.H.A.P.E. (Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators), who will be providing educational materials and condoms from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday in the K-State Student Union.

Shana Kerstetter, senior in family studies, said the group has compiled a list of where condoms are sold, and how much they cost in town, and they also will be selling condom bouquets for Sex Responsibility Week.

Kerstetter said the group, whose members are certified by the Red Cross on HIV and AIDS education, offers information about STDs and disease prevention.

"We mention in our presentations that you can have testing services done at Lafene," she said.

"After all, the average student has five partners while in college. We want to make that clear, and let them know where they can go if they need to be tested."

Sexual health information

SHAPE, Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators, will have an information table from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. in the K-State Student Union to inform students about the prevention of sexually transmitted diseases, as well as sell cash-and-carry bouquets of condoms for Sex Responsibility Week. The bouquets of condom flowers are $5 and include eight to 10 usable condoms.

FAA expands restricted airspace over Washington

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON – The restricted airspace over the nation's capital for private planes will expand beginning Monday in conjunction with the increase in the national terror threat level to orange, the Federal Aviation Administration announced Saturday.

"Terrorists are known to favor targets in the transportation sector and to consider our civil aviation system an arsenal of improvised weapons," said James M. Loy, undersecretary of the Transportation Department and head of the Transportation Security Administration.

"The Washington capital region is home to a number of particularly symbolic targets which must be protected. We appreciate the cooperation of the general aviation community as we implement sound security measures and tighten our defenses during this period of heightened alert," Loy said in a statement.

General aviation refers to privately operated aircraft, as opposed to airliners or military planes.

The new airspace control measures create what the FAA, an agency of the Transportation Department, calls an Air Defense Identification Zone in the airspace under 18,000 feet in roughly a 30-mile radius around Washington.

The previous restricted area was roughly 15 miles in radius.

Agency officials said they had designed the restrictions to increase security while allowing local general aviation airports to remain in operation.

A text of the FAA order and a detailed map of the affected area would be provided to Flight Service Stations over the weekend and would be posted on the FAA Web site, www.faa.gov.

"As pilots in the National Capital Region know all too well, proper preflight planning requires them to check for and review Notices to Airmen prior to every flight," said FAA Administrator Marion C. Blakey.

"As all federal, local and state agencies work together to respond to an increased threat level, the FAA will redouble its efforts to get the pilot community timely, accurate information and to balance current security needs with the needs of the flying public."

The new measures, which become effective at 6 a.m. Monday, require general aviation pilots to maintain two-way radio communications, use a transponder and discrete beacon code, file IFR/VFR flight plans and follow standard air traffic procedures before entering the restricted zone.

TO THE POINT

Registration law violates basic American rights

Basic rights are being infringed upon today in the United States.

Non-immigrants from 25 Middle Eastern countries are now required to register with U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Services by Feb. 21 because of their nationalities.

Again, America's government is testing the limits of its own Constitution.

While the United States continues to ignore habeas corpus at locations like Camp X-Ray in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the Bill of Rights also is being skirted by our government with a new, thinly-veiled scheme for racial profiling.

The National Security Entry-Exit Registration System is unconstitutional and must not be allowed to continue.

Requiring any person, foreign-born or not, to be subjected to fingerprinting, photographing and interviewing without reason or explanation is an insult to the ideals on which this country was founded – American ideals of personal freedom and liberty.

We urge you, as active, voting members of this country, to stand up for our inalienable rights and combat this, and any other, repression of our guaranteed personal freedoms.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

WIND BENEFITS

New energy source could be be beneficial for Kansas

It's all around you. It's an energy source that will never run out, never cause a world war and is far more efficient, cost-effective and profitable than fossil fuels ever could be. Can anyone guess what it is?

AIMEE NOEL

Yes folks, it's the wonderful wind – the same that makes Kansas winters so biting and summers so dirty and dry. It could be our economy's saving grace but for only one thing. Where should wind farms be located?

There is a heated debate over where wind turbine complexes should be placed. Power companies want to place wind farms in the Flint Hills. The conservationists, however, want to place the environmentally-friendly turbines in western Kansas, thus saving the Flint Hills from such a scar and preserving the beauty of the Kansas landscape.

What's the trouble with just putting them in western Kansas? There's room in the many fields of the high plains as well as people willing to have them. How is that even an issue? The simple answer to that is money.

As of now, there are no major power cables stretched across central Kansas to carry power from such westerly wind farms to the heavily populated areas like Kansas City, Topeka and Wichita. Without such cables, the power from wind farms in the west would be practically useless to Kansas.

It would cost the power companies a hefty sum to erect that many poles and stretch that much cable across Kansas, and at that cost, wind farms are not as profitable to them here and now. So they look to the Flint Hills.

The Flint Hills is one of the windiest regions of Kansas. That and its close location are what make the area so attractive to the power companies for wind turbine construction.

But the Flint Hills are also one of Kansas' most beautiful landscapes, habitat for some of Kansas' most characteristic animals and one of the largest areas of unspoiled tall grass prairie in our nation. Though the turbines will create little pollution in comparison to oil and coal usage, a lot of 200- to 500-foot-tall windmills would take away from the serene beauty of the Flint Hills, a major Kansas tourist attraction to be sure.

The Flint Hills are also one of the last extensive habitats for the Greater Prairie Chicken, which shies away from manmade structures and is in danger of going extinct. Kansas is the only state with a healthy and large enough population to sustain the bird, which should not have to face extinction due to power companies looking to boost profits by cutting costs irresponsibly.

Western Kansas is the best place for the wind turbines. Having rows of wind turbine complexes in a field would not disrupt a farmer's planting of his crops. It might actually help farmers cover costs as most people are offered "rent" for the land the turbines occupy amounting between $2,000 to $4,000 a turbine the first year, and a flat fee in the years to come. Such supplemental income would be a great thing for the farmers struck by drought and poor crop prices.

Wind turbines are a good thing, but only if they're in the right place. The Flint Hills is not the right place, western Kansas is. The only problem is the aforementioned lack of major power lines spanning Kansas to get the energy to where it is needed.

My suggestion to solving that problem is for all the power companies looking into wind energy to participate in a practice we all learn in kindergarten; it's called sharing.

If each company pooled a certain amount of money together to erect cables across the more northerly section of the state, subsidized by counties and perhaps state funds or tax credits, the power lines could be erected, and the turbine farms could be built where they would best serve their purpose without marring the beauty of Kansas' landscape. Everyone in Kansas would benefit from the increased amount of money coming into Kansas and the decreased pollution. Heck, even the prairie chickens would be happy.

It's all a matter of working together for the common good, a goal many of us seem to have forgotten with age and money. Every thing we do affects someone else, somewhere else, and environmental decisions should never be taken lightly, even if they do look good at a glance.

Wind farms in western Kansas: they're great for the environment, great for Kansans and great for chickens.

Government cannot ignore tensions with North Korea

FLETCHER JACOBS

Despite the fact that Colin Powell's multimedia presentation at the United Nations failed to convince key allies of a need for war, the Bush administration continues to put almost all the focus on Iraq. But the world hasn't stopped turning.

First, North Korea's nuclear showdown heated up as it threatened "all-out war" should the United States strike first. Meanwhile, the national terror alert level was raised to "high risk" orange, the second-highest level of the five-level system, as terror threats loom. These two events raise questions about the wisdom of Bush's obsession with Iraq.

North Korea began operations on its five-megawatt reactor, believed to produce plutonium for warheads. It also pulled 8,000 fuel rods used to make uranium out of storage. The North Korean government claims the reactor is needed to supply energy since the United States cut oil aid last October, after North Korea left the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Hard to believe since the North Korean government kicked all inspectors out of the country.

More likely, it believes it is the next contestant on "Showdowns with Rouge Nations." North Korea claimed that a pre-emptive U.S. attack on its reactor would trigger total war and claimed that the United States isn't the only country who could make such strikes.

Now, North Korea's brazen claims are nothing new. The country is more prone to hyperbole than Marv Albert during an Ohio St./Michigan game. It played a game of brinkmanship in the early '90s and just last year threatened to destroy the entire world.

President Kim Jong-Il has built a nation straight out of a George Orwell novel. He is exalted as the "Great Leader" by the state-controlled media, and the country is totally isolated from the rest of the world. It boasts the most militarized country on earth. The population of 22 million includes an army of 1 million and a reserve corps of 7 million. But the communist nation lives in a drastic situation of poverty and hunger.

So far, we've seemed to believe this is a minor issue compared to Iraq. But we don't have the troops to fight two wars simultaneously. Forget the talk of quick war as well, because that discounts the manpower that will be needed to stay in the countries afterward.

Plus, we refuse direct talks, as we have since Bush came to office. And let's just say branding them in Bush's infamous "Axis of Evil" speech last January didn't put us on each other's Christmas card lists.

The North Koreans have said they will stop their nuclear program if oil aid is re-established, something Bush compared to "nuclear blackmail" after they broke the treaty. But possessing a nuclear arsenal is leverage. We believe they already have two nuclear warheads but don't know for sure. They could develop six more within months if left alone with the rods they have.

If we are worried about nuclear threats from terrorists, North Korea would seem to be a more logical target with its hopeless economy.

While all this was going on, the Washington Post reported that arrests of terrorists slowed a large-scale, planned attack by al-Qaeda. These attacks were to include smaller attacks at the same time, including assassination attempts against U.S. figures.

Still, the terror level was raised on Friday as reports said attacks were to coincide with Hajji, the traditional Muslim pilgrimage to Mecca and Mina. Americans were warned of attacks against "soft" targets like apartments, amusement parks and sporting events. The terror threat is believed to be worse than before Sept. 11, 2001.

Our response? Raise the terror alert and warn citizens abroad. One of the steps for citizens to take according to the Department of Homeland Security is "to be aware of your surrounding and events that happen around you." Glad they're putting that budget money to good use. I know I feel a lot safer with that insightful tip.

Our belief is that Iraq must be dealt with immediately. We've dealt most of our resources and energy in working toward that goal. But the question has to be what the more urgent threat is.

The world isn't going to stop for us to go to war with Iraq. It is time we turn some attention to threats that we don't need inspectors to point out.

Germany, France want to send U.N. soldiers to disarm Iraq

By Colleen Barry
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MUNICH, Germany – France and Germany intend to present a proposal to the U.N. Security Council next week to send U.N. soldiers to disarm Iraq, the German defense minister said Sunday.

The plan involves reconnaissance missions, the deployment of thousands of U.N. peacekeepers and tripling the number of U.N. weapons inspectors.

In Paris, the French government on Sunday denied the existence of a "secret plan" with Germany, saying France had previously proposed increasing the number of arms inspectors. That denial – plus Defense Minister Peter Struck's inability to offer concrete details of the reported plan – created an appearance of disarray in the Franco-German alliance against Washington's hard-line stance on Iraq.

The reported plan drew harsh criticism from U.S. officials including Secretary of State Colin Powell, who called it an ineffective ploy by Berlin and Paris to delay military action.

Powell, in Washington, bluntly dismissed the proposal. Increasing the number of U.N. inspectors would be "a diversion, not a solution," he said.

"The issue is not more inspectors. The issue is compliance on the part of Saddam Hussein," Powell said in a television interview.

News of the plan emerged as hundreds of leading government officials and security experts attended a two-day defense conference in Munich, which ended Sunday.

Still, U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who attended the conference, learned nothing about the reported plan in meetings with both the French and German defense ministers.

"Rumsfeld was here for 24 hours meeting with German and French officials and no one told him anything. That was not an auspicious start," a senior U.S. official at the Munich meeting said on condition of anonymity.

Addressing the conference, Struck said the starting point for the French-German proposal was a French initiative to increase the number of inspectors in Iraq "in order to give them a better chance to succeed."

Israel offers Palestinians phased truce

By Ramit Flushnick Masti
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM – Israel has offered the Palestinians a gradual cease-fire, a senior government official said Sunday, while suggesting that efforts to remove Yasser Arafat as Palestinian leader will intensify after the U.S.-Iraq conflict is resolved.

Also Sunday, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was awarded the task of forming a coalition, a formality that starts the clock ticking.

Sharon has six weeks to form a government and – if the moderate Labor Party doesn't budge on its refusal to join with Sharon's Likud – the re-elected prime minister may have to rely on extreme right-wing and religious parties for a majority.

Such a coalition would make concessions to the Palestinians nearly impossible.

Sharon offered the limited truce in secret talks last week with senior Palestinian negotiator Ahmed Qureia. There was speculation that the meeting – the prime minister's first with a Palestinian negotiator in about a year – was aimed at persuading Labor to join his coalition.

Labor has said it would not enter a Sharon-led government unless he agreed to withdraw from the Gaza Strip immediately and resume peace talks.

The director of Sharon's office, Dov Weisglass, denied any such political motivation to the meeting, which he attended.

In talks with Qureia, Sharon did not mention a U.S.-backed plan for Palestinian statehood by 2005. Instead, he reiterated support for a provisional state in parts of the West Bank and Gaza as a long-term interim solution, said a Palestinian official close to the talks. Palestinians have rejected such a plan.

Regarding a gradual truce, Sharon proposed that Israeli troops withdraw from Palestinian areas where militants have been subdued by Palestinian security forces, Weisglass said.

Similar arrangements have failed in the past, in part because Palestinian security forces weakened by Israeli military strikes have lost control in many areas of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and because Israel has refused to stop killing Palestinian militants in targeted attacks.

A gradual cease-fire took hold for a short while in the West Bank town of Bethlehem, but fell apart after a suicide bombing on a bus in Jerusalem on Nov. 21 in which 11 people were killed. Israel reoccupied Bethlehem, the bomber's hometown, following the attack.

Since June, Israel has reoccupied every West Bank Palestinian town and city, except Jericho, essentially overturning autonomy the Palestinians received in 1994-95 interim peace deals.

Jerseys worn as throwback to 1970s, 80s

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Not much gets by KU All-American Nick Collison.

In fact, on Saturday he noticed right away that the Wildcats' jerseys didn't exactly match their shorts.

"What was that – violet jerseys with purple shorts?" he said. "I can't lie. I think they are kind of ugly. At first I thought they lost their jerseys and had to wear those."

Actually, it was lavender, and yes, Coach Jim Wooldridge confirmed they were worn on purpose.

The jerseys were throwbacks. In the late 1970s and early 1980s the Cats battled wearing the light tops and dark shorts. The team usually wore the uniforms on the road, and they seemed to help out.

www.kstatecollegian.com

Check out game coverage and additional photos of K-State's 82-64 loss to No. 12/11 Kansas, only at www.kstatecollegian.com.

That period was witness to some of the best basketball in K-State history. The Cats advanced to the Elite 8 in 1981 and to the Sweet 16 in 1982. Some of the greatest players to ever don the purple and white wore lavender, too.

Rolando Blackman played during that period before he turned in 13 seasons in the NBA. Chuckie Williams, Mike Evans and Tim Jankovich all played then as well.

The jerseys even made the cover of Sports Illustrated in 1981 when Blackman sank a last second shot to beat No. 2 Oregon State in the NCAA tournament. He is still the only Wildcat to ever grace the cover, and he did so wearing lavender.

Just how the jerseys came about is up for debate, though.

Ernie Barrett, the athletic director at the time, said legendary Wildcat coach Jack Hartman was the one responsible for the lavender jerseys.

A popular myth credits the uniforms to a mistake. When Hartman ordered new jerseys before the season, someone inadvertently wrote down the wrong color. They opened the boxes weeks later and found a pastel surprise to go with the normal purple shorts.

Barrett said buying the uniforms and selecting what they looked like all fell on Hartman, and that as athletic director, he was not involved. If there was a mistake made, he

Cats' 2nd half attempts prove embarrassing

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

I almost brought down the K-State flag outside my parent's home Saturday afternoon.

I can deal with defeat – even against KU – as long as the Cats put up a valiant fight in the process. In simple terms, Saturday's loss would have been easier to swallow if K-State would have tried in the second half.

DAN SMITH

Instead, the Wildcats embarrassed themselves Saturday afternoon against the No. 12/11 Jayhawks, and I felt cheated for sitting through it.

True, nobody tied me to the couch and forced me to watch All-American Kirk Hinrich put on a clinic for sold-out Bramlage Coliseum and most of the Wildcats during the second half.

Rather, I stayed tuned to the game in much the same way bystanders flock to gruesome car accidents to gawk at the aftermath.

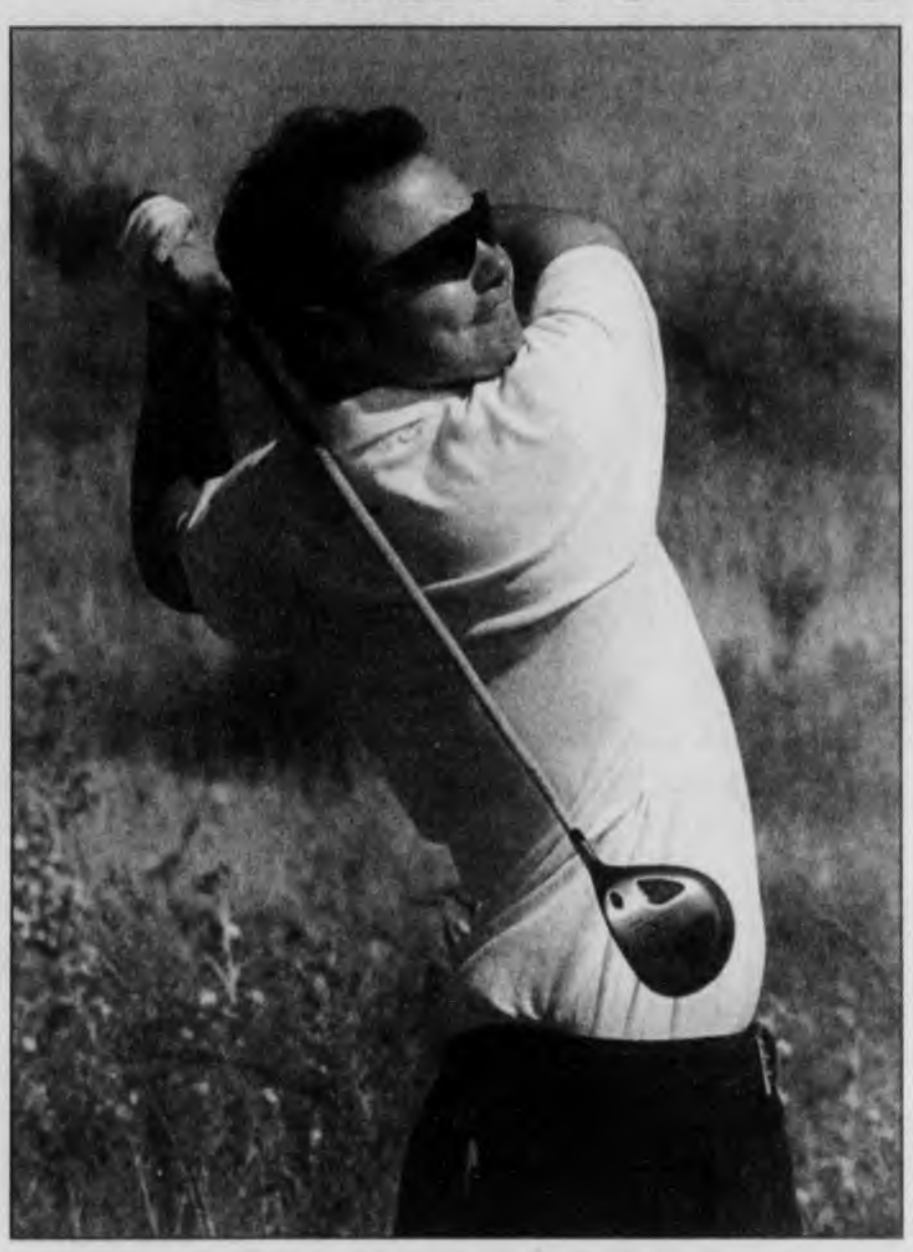
Fact is, K-State played hard for 20 minutes.

After that, they quit.

The Cats competed at a level they hadn't all season in the game's first half. In the second, though, K-State was content to pack it in and watch KU run and gun at will.

"They ran us out of the gym at the end there," senior Matt Siebrandt said. "It seemed like they had an extra gear and we couldn't keep up with them."

Meanwhile, K-State was content to downshift its attack, rest on defense and settle for low-percentage shots on offense.



Even after KU's other All-American, Nick Collison, went to the bench with foul trouble early in the period, the Cats couldn't drop the hammer.

For the second time in as many games, the Cats simply didn't have the legs to play for 40 minutes – the length, minus a rare overtime period, of every other college basketball game these athletes have ever played.

Men's golf team heads to Rice after 3 1/2 month break

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Preparing for a golf tournament in early February can be a tough when you play in Kansas.

With snow and frigid temperatures keeping K-State off the course in January, the Wildcats understood the challenges of the season as well as anyone.

But the team had a window of opportunity a little more than a week ago, with a break in the weather to hit the practice tees.

Coach Tim Norris is hoping the Cats' modified preparations are enough heading into today's Rice Intercollegiate in Cypress, Texas.

The 13-team field starts at 7:30 a.m. today and Tuesday, with 36 holes scheduled for the first day and the final 18 slated for Tuesday.

K-State's practice has been limited mostly to hitting indoors and putting, but the team was outside to play qualifying rounds for this week's tournament.

"We had a lot of good scores, so I was really pleased," Norris said. "All the guys are anxious to get down to Rice and see what we can do."

This will be the Cats' first tournament in nearly 3 and a half months, after K-State tied for sixth at the Baylor Invitational in Waco, Texas, on Oct. 28. Junior A.J. Elgert led K-State with a 13th-place finish, firing a 2-under 214.

Elgert will sit out the Rice tournament, however, due to a finger broken during a pick-up basketball game. Juniors Aaron Watkins and Greg Douglas will lead the Wildcats instead, along with freshmen Josh Persons and Ben Kern, and sophomores Jonathan James and Matt Van Cleave. Van Cleave will compete as the Wildcats' lone individual entry.

Momentum

❑ K-State concluded the fall season ranked No. 34 in the Sagarin rankings. In six fall tournaments, the Wildcats finished third three times and claimed a victory in the K-State/Oklahoma Shootout at Colbert Hills Golf Course. The Wildcats' team average of 291.5 was nearly a five-stroke improvement over last fall's average of 296.3.

Norris said the February tournament could lead to a strong spring for the Wildcats.

"The guys look forward to getting started fairly early and not waiting until the end of the month or the first week in March to get started, so this will be a nice way to get started," he said.

"We've had some pretty good production in practice inside, and we're working hard on putting, so I'm excited and interested to see how we'll do."

Norris said indoor practice has been tough, but he said that once the team gets back on the course, things should pick up where they left off in the fall.

"We've practiced really, really hard on putting. We've had drills that all the players have gone through, so it won't take them long to pick it up once we get down there," Norris said.

"They've been hitting every day, some of the guys have been hitting twice a day, once in the morning and once in the evening – so I think we'll have the touch. I think we'll lack long-game-wise, but we might pick up a few shots putting."

The tournament moves to a new venue this season – the par-72, 7,075-yard Black Horse Golf Club – after being at the Meadowbrook Farms course in Katy, Texas, the first two years.

"This will be our first time on this golf course, but we've heard it's a really good test of golf," Norris said. "That will be fun for the guys and give them something to work on.

"It's not about 'we need to beat this team or finish here or finish there,' it's just kind of getting started," he said. "It's a long season and we just want to get it started right."

K-State sports wrap up successful weekend in tennis, track, womens basketball

Tennis

K-State's tennis team remained undefeated this weekend with its third-straight win to extend its best start since 1989 with a 7-0 shutout win against Wichita State.

The 56th-ranked Wildcats (3-0) earned wins in five of six singles matches and won by default at No. 6 singles because the Shockers (1-3) only fielded five members.

In doubles, Petra Sedlmajerova and Paulina Castillejos edged Wichita State's Amanda Cervantes and Ana Ines Exeni 9-7 at No. 1, and Andrea Cooper and Jessica Simosa had an easy time with WSU's No. 2 combination of Wendi Webster and Natalia Guzman 8-3 to snatch the doubles point.

Equestrian

Amanda Gigot and Erin Peery tied for High-Point Rider honors Sunday afternoon at Fox Creek Stables as the Wildcat riders posted their fourth consecutive and sixth team victory of the season.

On Saturday, K-State started the spring season successfully. Peery earned High-Point Rider honors in her first show as a Wildcat with two first-place finishes. Baldwin was named Reserve High-Point Rider with first- and second-place finishes.

Track

Amy Mortimer won the women's 3,000-meter run and hit an NCAA provisional-qualifying mark in the mile to highlight K-State performances Saturday at the Adidas Classic indoor track and field meet hosted by the University of Nebraska.

Mortimer won the 3,000 in 9:38.20, cutting nearly 10 seconds off her previous season-best time in that event. Trish Culbertson of K-State also had a season-best in the event, finishing fourth in 9:55.78 and moving into 10th on the Wildcats' all-time list.

Rebekah Green ran her unbeaten streak in the indoor season to six competitions in the women's shot put, using her 56-1 mark to win by more than four feet.

Other Wildcat winners on the women's side were Shunte Thomas, who won the 600-yard run in a season-best 1:25.36, and Lysaira Roman-Del Valle, who won the 800 in 2:10.03.

Kansas State freshman Coby Cost won the men's weight throw for the fifth straight week, winning at 65-2, and Joseph Lee had a career-best 1:48.58 to win the men's 800 meters, topping an outstanding field.

Christian Smith won the 1,000 meters for the Wildcats in 2:25.36, moving into sixth on K-State's all-time list in that event.

Men's basketball

Kirk Hinrich scored 28 points as No. 12/11 Kansas came back to beat K-State 82-64 Saturday, the Jayhawks' 26th straight victory over their state rivals.

Kansas' Keith Langford shoots the ball over Pervis Pasco in K-State's 82-64 loss to Kansas Saturday. The loss marked the 20th loss to Kansas in Manhattan.

Kelly Glasscock
COLLEGIAN

Keith Langford had 18 and Aaron Miles 13 for Kansas (17-5, 7-1), which has not lost to the Wildcats (11-10, 2-6) since Jan. 17, 1994. The Jayhawks have not lost in Manhattan since Jan. 29, 1983, a span of 20 games.

Since Bramlage Coliseum opened in 1989, the Jayhawks are 15-0 on the Wildcats' home court.

Women's basketball

Kansas State's Kendra Wecker warmed up just in time Saturday against Baylor.

Wecker scored 14 of her 23 points in the second half — including eight during a crucial late run — as No. 5 Kansas State beat Baylor 65-53.

Kansas State (21-2, 8-1 Big 12) led 24-23 at halftime, then opened the second half with a 10-2 run keyed by 3-pointers from Chelsea Domenico and Amy Dutmer.

AMERICA'S LOVE FOR CHOCOLATE

Scientists attempt to explain emotional, physical reasons for cravings

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a common scene – the woman crying on the couch as she devours every chocolate bar in sight trying to cure her depression. Or the girl on her period desperately searching for a Hershey's kiss to satisfy her sweet tooth.

America's love affair with chocolate cravings led to the consumption of 3.1 billion pounds of the candy in 2001.

The sudden cravings for chocolate can be overwhelming, but how real are they?

Studies have shown that chocolate is the most craved food in the U.S., according to www.candyusa.org, especially by women. Men tend to crave more spicy foods, with pizza coming in as the first choice.

Chocolate's appeal comes from its aroma, texture and flavor. Eating chocolate is a more unique experience than eating other snacks because the cocoa butter ingredient melts at mouth temperature.

One scientific theory for food cravings is evidence that the body often craves nutrients it needs, such as the magnesium in chocolate.

Another theory about chocolate cravings suggests chocolate may elevate the mood because of certain bioactive compounds it contains. One of those, phenylethylamine, has been administered to depressed patients to improve mood.

Rachel Grimmer, sophomore in secondary education, drinks a glass of chocolate milk every morning, but craves it most when she is upset.

"If I am sad, I really want some chocolate," Grimmer said. "If I have a headache or if I am stressed, chocolate and Diet Coke make it feel better."

According to www.candyusa.org, a decrease in serotonin levels leads to cravings for sweet foods, like chocolate, because carbohydrates boost the amount of serotonin levels in the brain.

This need for serotonin is enhanced when women go through pre-menstrual syndrome.

Among the most aggravating physical changes that may occur with PMS are weight gain and food cravings, said Judith Wurtman, a research scientist at Massachusetts Institute of Technology who has done studies on brain chemistry and PMS treatment.

Chocolate and chips are at the top of the list when women say they experience PMS food cravings. Food cravings associated with PMS are not the result of a nutritional deficiency, Wurtman said.

"It's a brain deficiency," she said. "It's a real phenomenon, provoked by changes in the brain when one's hormones are changing. The one chemical that drives all of this is serotonin. One way you can make serotonin is by eating carbohydrates. But you don't have to eat chocolate or potato chips to do that any more than you need to drink champagne to satisfy your thirst."

In a study done by Michener and Rozin, scientists tried to isolate the ingredient in chocolate, either cocoa powder or cocoa butter, that creates such a desire. Cocoa powder contains all of the bioactive ingredients while cocoa butter contains none.

The study found that milk chocolate satisfied the subjects' cravings along with white chocolate, both are absent of bioactive ingredients associated with uplifting moods.

Often, chocolate cravings represent a desire for a sensory or emotional experience, the Hershey's company reported.

People crave certain foods simply because the enjoy the taste, texture and smell or the association with a special occasion.

"I like chocolate a whole lot," Grimmer said. "I am always up for it."

Some Recipes for Chocoholics

Hershey's Best Brownies

1 c	Butter or margarine
2 c	Sugar
2 t	Vanilla extract
4	Eggs
3/4 c	Hershey's Cocoa
1 c	All-purpose flour
1/2 t	Baking powder
1/4 t	Salt
1 c	Chopped nuts (optional)

Heat oven to 350 F. Grease 13x9x2-inch baking pan. In large microwave-safe bowl, place butter. Microwave at high 2 - 2-1/2 minutes or until melted. Stir in sugar and vanilla. Add eggs, one at a time, beating well with spoon after each addition. Add cocoa; beat until well blended. Add flour, baking powder and salt; beat well. Stir in nuts, if desired. Pour batter into prepared pan. Bake 30 - 35 minutes or until brownies begin to pull away from sides of pan. Cool completely in pan on wire rack. Cut into bars. Makes about 36 brownies.

Easy Chocolate Cake

2 2/3 c	Flour
2 t	Baking soda
2/3 c	Cocoa powder
2 c	White sugar
1 t	Salt
2 c	Water
2 t	Vanilla
2/3 c	Vegetable oil
2 t	White vinegar

Preheat oven to 350 F. Sift dry ingredients into a bowl. Add liquid. Mix well. Transfer to 13 X 9 X 2-inch pan. Bake for 35 minutes.

Double Chocolate Chip Cookies

2/3 c	Butter
1 c	Sugar
1	Egg
1 T	Vanilla
1/2 c	Unsweetened Cocoa Powder
1/2 c	Buttermilk —or— water
1 3/4 c	All-Purpose Flour
1/2 t	Baking Soda
1/2 t	Salt
1 c	Semisweet Chocolate Chips

Preheat oven to 350 F. Cream butter, sugar, egg and vanilla until well blended. Combine cocoa and buttermilk (or water) in a separate bowl until smooth. Add to creamed mixture. Add flour, baking soda and salt, beating just until blended. Stir in chocolate chips. Drop dough by teaspoonfuls onto ungreased cookie sheet. Bake for 8-10 minutes or until centers are almost set. Remove from cookie sheet while hot.
Makes 48 cookies.

Chocolate Cheesecake

Graham Cracker Crust

6 oz	Bittersweet Chocolate
1/4 Cup	Rum
1 lb	Cream Cheese
3/4 Cup	Extra Fine Sugar
1/2 Cup	Sour Cream
1 T	Vanilla Extract
4	X-Large Eggs

Preheat oven to 325 F. Prepare the graham cracker crust in a springform pan. Refrigerate the pan until needed. Melt the chocolate over low heat. Add the rum. Set aside.
Beat the cream cheese until fluffy. Gradually beat in the sugar, sour cream and vanilla. Beat in the eggs, one at a time. Mix well. Place the bowl over hot water and stir until smooth. Pour one quarter of the batter into another bowl. Set aside. Mix the chocolate into the remaining batter. Stir over hot water until smooth.
Take the springform pan from the refrigerator. Pour in the chocolate batter. Gently pour the plain batter over the top of the chocolate batter. Form swirls in the batter with a fork (some of the chocolate should show). Bake for 50 minutes. Cool to room temperature. Remove the rim from the springform pan. Refrigerate overnight. Serve.

Chocolate Creme Pie

1 Cup	Sugar
1/3 Cup	All-purpose flour
1/4 t	Salt
2	1oz squares of unsweetened chocolate
2 Cups	Milk
3	Slightly beaten egg yolks
2 T	Butter or margarine
1 t	Vanilla
1	9-inch baked pastry shell
1	Recipe meringue

Preheat oven to 350 F. In saucepan, combine sugar and salt. Chop up unsweetened chocolate and add with milk; gradually stir into dry mixture. Cook and stir over medium heat till mixture boils and thickens. Cook two minutes longer. Remove from heat. Stir small amounts hot mixture into yolks; return to hot mixture; cook two minutes, stirring constantly. Remove from heat. Add butter and vanilla; cool to room temperature.
Pour into baked pastry shell. Meringue; Beat three eggs with 1/4 t cream of tartar and 1/2 t vanilla till soft peaks form. Gradually add 6 T sugar, beating till stiff peaks form and all sugar is dissolved. Spread atop pie, sealing to pastry. Bake about 12 to 15 minutes or till meringue is golden. Cool.

TV viewers flock to ABC special on Michael Jackson

More than 27 million viewers couldn't resist a peek into Michael Jackson's bizarre private life Thursday night, a number that explained why ABC fought a bidding war to air it.

The special edition of "20-20" was the highest-rated newsmagazine since Barbara Walters talked to Monica Lewinsky three years ago, and ABC's biggest audience, excluding sports and the Academy Awards, since Michael J. Fox's "Spin City" farewell in May 2000.

DECEIVE | Rice says compliance by Iraq is attempt to cheat, recede moment of truth for the United Nations. The United Nations gets to decide shortly whether or not it is going to be relevant in terms of keeping the peace, whether or not its words mean anything.

"But one thing is certain, for the sake of peace and for the sake of security of the United States and our friends and allies, we will disarm Saddam Hussein if he will not disarm himself."

Bush said "it is important for the country to realize that Saddam Hussein has fooled the world for 12 years, is used to fooling the world, is confident he can fool the world."

Earlier, Bush's national security adviser, Condoleezza Rice, dismissed movement toward compliance by Iraq as another attempt at "cheat and retreat."

"We have seen this game with Iraq many times before, throughout the '90s," she said on CBS's "Face the Nation." "When there's enough pressure, the Iraqis try to do just a little bit in order to release the pressure."

Secretary of State Colin Powell said a reported French-German proposal to increase the number of weapons inspectors in Iraq in hopes of averting U.S. military action is "a diversion, not a solution" to disarming Saddam.

Powell said he did not know the details of the proposal, first disclosed by the German media, but said it focused on the "wrong issue."

"The issue is not more inspectors. The issue is compliance on the part of Saddam Hussein," Powell said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The plan would call for the deployment of thousands of U.N. soldiers, reconnaissance flights and a tripling of the number of weapons inspectors, according to the German magazine Der Spiegel.

But the top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, Michigan's Carl Levin, told "Fox News Sunday" that "it seems to me we ought to be welcoming efforts to forestall war, even if we disagree with those efforts after we read them. We should not treat the U.N. Security Council as some kind of a stumbling block."

Powell said there would be no need for such a plan if Saddam does what he is supposed to, such as revealing the whereabouts of allegedly unaccounted for anthrax and other deadly chemical and biological agents. That can be handled with a mere handful of inspectors, Powell said.

"The idea of more inspectors or no-fly zones or whatever else may be in this proposal that is being developed is a diversion, not a solution," Powell said.

France and Germany are two European countries most resistant to the idea of war with Iraq as a means of stripping Saddam of weapons of mass destruction.

Also Sunday, Pope John Paul II ordered a special envoy sent to Iraq to emphasize his plea for peace and encourage Iraqi authorities to cooperate with the United Nations, the Vatican said.

But Powell, who last week went before the U.N. Security Council with intelligence information to support U.S. claims of Iraqi noncompliance, said the United States would march into Iraq without the support of France and Germany, as well as without U.N. backing, if necessary.

Navy concludes last planned targeting exercise after firing inert 5-inch shells at Vieques Island

By Sandra Ivelisse Villerrae
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VIEQUES, Puerto Rico – The U.S. Navy has concluded its last scheduled round of targeting exercises on the Puerto Rican island of Vieques with a ship firing inert shells at the bombing range, the U.S. Navy said Sunday.

The guided-missile cruiser USS Ticonderoga stopped firing 5-inch shells at the island Saturday afternoon, said Lt. Cmdr. Kim Dixon, a Navy spokeswoman. She said Navy ships would continue training at sea.

"The training overall went very smoothly," Dixon said. "They accomplished all their missions."

Meanwhile, demonstrators were driving across civilian areas of Vieques in a caravan to mark the end of training.

The Navy says it will withdraw from Vieques by May 1, turning over the island's eastern third to the U.S. Department of the Interior and moving training to locations in Florida and elsewhere on the U.S. mainland.

But some protesters have expressed skepticism that the Navy will leave as planned. Activists say the bombing exercises, which began in 1947, have harmed the environment and the health of the island's 9,100 residents.

The Navy denies the claims.

The training has been criticized by Puerto Rican leaders since off-target bombs killed a civilian guard on the firing range in 1999.

Since then, the Navy has turned to inert ammunition, while more than 1,000 protesters have been arrested for trespassing on Navy lands.

Nineteen demonstrators were detained for trespassing during the latest 27 days of training, while one man was detained for cutting a Navy fence, Dixon said.

INS | New registration law creates anxiety for Middle-Eastern students said. "It's just that one group we're catching when they come in."

Karim, who is from Faisalabad, Pakistan, has been in the United States for three years working on a doctorate.

Karim has not yet registered, but said he's heard from friends who have gone through the process that waits can be extensive.

Because the INS offices in both Kansas City and Wichita are open only on weekdays, students who have to register must take a day off from classes.

"We have to go during the week, and this is really terrible because our whole schedule of study is disturbed," Karim said.

Karim said that because students have to provide several documents including their passports, letters from their department and transcripts, the hassle of registering isn't a one-day deal.

"It is taking too much time," he said.

"It is difficult to manage all these resources and go to INS in Wichita or Kansas City, and we have to face a lot of trouble there. Because there are so many other people that are visiting, we have to spend the whole day, and that's a big problem."

However, Karim said the biggest problem with INS registration is that those having to register are now fearful and insecure in the United States.

Ashraf Aly, graduate student in economics, agreed and called the registration process a type of discrimination that is 100 percent against the U.S. constitution.

"This is absolutely unfair because only Muslims and Arabs are required to register," Aly, who is from Cairo, Egypt, said.

However, Heston said he hasn't heard any complaints yet.

"I'm sure there are groups out there who disagree, and people who are complaining about it, but no one's called," Heston said.

Karim expressed worries about living in the United States because of the INS registration rules.

"With these new rules, we are afraid the American government will have other rules," Karim said. "We are really afraid that our stay will not be so pleasant in the U.S. anymore."

Aly agreed.

"Now I have many doubts about what is so called 'human rights' in the U.S.," he said.

Heston said it is important to understand why INS is requiring registration.

"It's a requirement of the law – a requirement of the country they're in, and failure to comply with that may subject them to removal from the United States," he said. "This is not optional. This is dealing with the issues of national security that the president has determined to be necessary, and we are going to follow through with that."

JERSEY | Men wear uniforms as a way to inspire a change in attitude

K-State forward Marques Hayden tries for two against Kansas Saturday in Bramlage. Hayden had 13 points in the 82-64 loss to Kansas.

never knew about it. Either way, though, he said Hartman took the ball and ran with it, using the uniforms as a coaching gimmick.

"It's hard to say how it all came about. It was started by Jack Hartman," Barrett said. "He wanted to change the colors and get a new attitude. It was typical coaching thing. He thought maybe new uniforms would help get the ball in the hole."

On Saturday, it was Wooldridge who broke out the uniforms, and it was a new generation of Cats that he hoped to inspire.

Wooldridge said the uniforms were ordered during the summer – on purpose this time – and the decision to wear them fell to his players.

"We left it up to them," Wooldridge said, "and they were excited about doing it."

And it nearly worked, too.

K-State played with KU for the first 30 minutes, but couldn't hold it together any longer and fell in an 82-64 loss.

Though most of the current Cats weren't even born when Hartman's boys ran the floor, the significance of the retro look was not lost upon them. Matt Siebrandt said everyone knew what it was all about.

"We found out during shootaround," he said.

"It's tradition for our program, and I thought it was a good idea. Everyone knew what the jerseys were about. We didn't really think they matched too well, but it is something to be proud of."

CONDITIONING | Cats must improve physical condition to win

And therein lies the problem with this team. Every Division-1 player – and by definition, every K-State basketball player – should be able to compete for the entire game. It's called conditioning, and the Wildcats showed on Saturday why it should be an area of concern for Coach Jim Wooldridge.

Against No. 11 Oklahoma State on Feb. 5, K-State trailed by four points at halftime, but a 7-0 run midway through the second half buried the Cats. The Cowboys managed 14 points off fast breaks, as well, compared with none for K-State.

On Saturday at Bramlage, where the Cats have never beaten the Jayhawks and with emotions running high, KU put together an impressive run that looked even better because of K-State's winded state.

Fast break tally: Jayhawks 23, Wildcats seven.

"Whenever you play KU, it's going to be a transition game, up and down, up and down, but that's no excuse," Siebrandt said. "We didn't get the job done."

Realistically, the job is far from complete.

Wooldridge's crew has several hours on the court in front of it before it will be in the right physical condition to compete against a team of the Jayhawks' caliber.

None of that work involves a basketball. K-State can shoot. The Wildcats can rebound. They have a good coach and decent players.

Problem is, they can't run.

Police want to question man about Kemp murder

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A man suspected of serial rape is now wanted for questioning in connection with the June 18 2002 murder of former K-State student Ali Kemp.

James Craig Strader is wanted for the kidnapping and rape of a Johnson County woman in late January, and the same incidents with a Warsaw, Mo. woman. This weekend, he allegedly kidnapped and raped a Hutchinson woman and drove her to Kansas City. All three women escaped.

Kemp, a freshman at K-State in 2002, was found by her father in a Leawood, Kan., swimming pool's pump room suffering from severe head injuries and was declared dead at the hospital. Her death was ruled a homicide. A composite sketch of the suspect was released last summer.

Major Craig Hill, operations commander for the Leawood Police Department, said more than 1,000 people have been interviewed since the murder and detectives have 1,500 leads or, 20 a week.

"This is extremely tasking for an agency our size," Hill said. "We have a long road uphill. We do not get too excited or overreact to a very positive lead

Jacob Craig Strader is wanted in connection with three incidents of rape and kidnapping. He is a white male, 240 pounds with short reddish-blond hair. He may be driving a 1987 light blue Honda with Kansas license plate number RMW 931. Anyone with information should call the Kansas Bureau of Investigation at 1-800-KS-CRIME.

CUSTODIAL CUTS

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN

John Woods, director of facility services, said it takes two custodians at least 40 minutes to clean a lecture hall like Umberger 105, with food and drink spills on the carpet extending that cleaning time.

Budget constraints cause decrease in facilities personnel, services

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students can lend a hand in cleaning up some of the mess left by Kansas' budget shortfall – by cleaning up after themselves.

"We're encouraging students to adopt the national parks' policy: Pack it in, pack it out," said Tim Bagby, instructional assistance manager for the Information Technology Assistance Center.

The custodial staff has been forced to make drastic cuts in services and personnel because of the university's budget woes, John Woods, director of facility services, said.

About 20 custodial positions have been cut in the past few months, leaving only about 100, Woods said.

"They're really working hard, trying to keep up with what they did before," he said. "And they just can't."

To augment the strain of working with a smaller staff, additional buildings have been added to the custodial staff's responsibility, Woods said. The Ackert Hall addition and Hoeflin Stone House now are included in the staff's duties, but there are no new custodians to handle them, spreading the custodians thin.

"It's a double whammy," Woods said.

In an attempt to keep campus buildings as clean as possible, Woods said the staff is rationing its efforts. Professors' offices and hallways are being cleaned less often, and some trash receptacles are being emptied only once every couple of days. The decisions on where to cut back are based on need, he said.

Lisa Harrington, associate professor of geography,

Large signs like this one are posted outside of Umberger 105, remind students that there's "no food or drink in auditorium" in hopes of preventing messy lecture halls.

Package would provide farmers with assistance

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The U.S. Senate last month passed the Cochran Amendment to the Omnibus Appropriations bill. If passed in the House of Representatives and signed by President Bush, it will bring financial disaster relief to Kansas farmers and producers more quickly than in previous drought years.

Senator Sam Brownback, R-Kan., said he expected the package to pass through Congress this week.

The amendment redistributed the $3.1 billion in disaster assistance, which was contained in the original bill, by giving the funding only to farmers in designated disaster counties, or counties that have lost 35 percent of their crops.

Martin Albright, administrator at the Kansas Farm Management Program, said the amendment is both good and bad.

Albright said that in previous years disaster relief has been given on an individual basis, so that only those who really need the aid receive it.

With the Cochran Amendment, Albright said some producers who are in a designated disaster county but had a normal production year will still receive disaster aid money.

"It should've been targeted better," he said.

However, Albright said that in previous years it took longer for farmers to actually get the aid because of the paperwork process they had to go through. The amendment would get that money into farmers' hands more quickly.

Last week, the House was looking at the farm package and deciding if the aid would be going to farmers who truly suffered drought losses.

Brownback said if the Cochran Amendment is maintained, not only will farmers receive aid quickly, but livestock producers will also benefit. Because the package was revamped to allow only certain counties to be

SGA elections move in-house

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The problems that plagued last year's Student Governing Association's elections shouldn't occur this year.

The primary and general election will be handled in-house through a collaborative effort between the Department of Continuing Education and the Information Technology Assistance Center.

Rebecca Gould, director of iTAC, said the effort to keep online voting in-house has been a positive experience. It should result in minimal problems, she said.

"The people that develop the ballot and understand the elections have worked closely for a year to make the process work," Gould said. "It makes resolving problems so much easier."

For the past three years, K-State has used an outside vendor for the online balloting system. Before that time, paper ballots were used.

Online balloting was moved in-house partially as a result of the technology problems that stemmed from iBallot.com's online ballot.

Last year's primary election displayed the names of illegitimate write-in candidates on the official ballot.

Also, the general election didn't include a space for write-in candidates, which election regulation codes require.

Because of the problems, election officials decided to have a second general election.

This year, however, the online balloting system has been tested in advance to catch any glitches before voting begins.

Bill Harlan, assistant coordinator of student activities and services, said the mock election, which SGA members participated in, uncovered only minor problems.

"Most of it was wording and some of the information was unclear to students not involved in the process," he said. "There were no significant problems."

Being able to customize the online balloting system to K-State's specific needs should improve voting process.

NATO in crisis after French, Germans, Belgians block military planning
France, Germany and Belgium blocked NATO efforts Monday to begin planning for possible Iraqi attacks against Turkey, deepening divisions in the alliance over the U.S.-led push to oust Saddam Hussein. Rumsfeld warned continued delays in responding to Turkey's request were "inexcusable" and risked undermining the credibility of the alliance.

Pentagon orders commercial airlines to help move troops to Gulf region
The U.S. military has activated a reserve fleet of commercial aircraft to move troops to a potential war zone. Pentagon officials said 13 flights were scheduled to fly troops Monday after Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld mobilized the Civil Reserve Air Fleet, passenger and cargo planes that can be used to move service members and equipment in emergencies.

Israel bans Palestinians, cancels easing measures for Muslim holiday
Israel clamped a total closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip on Monday, banning all Palestinians from entering Israel, citing warnings of Palestinian attacks. Earlier Monday, Israeli troops killed two suspected Palestinian militants, including an unarmed fugitive, and caught a would-be suicide bomber who hid an explosives-laden suitcase in a hotel.

NASA finds part of left wing in potential key to crash investigation
NASA said Monday it has recovered part of Columbia's left wing, a section thought to have played a major role in the space shuttle disaster. NASA said it has also found the cover of one of the two landing gear compartments, another potentially critical piece because a temperature surge inside the left wheel well was the first sign of trouble.

Judge blocks anti-war march directly past the United Nations
Citing safety concerns in "this time of heightened security," a federal judge Monday upheld the city's refusal to allow anti-war demonstrators to march past the United Nations. Chris Dunn of the New York Civil Liberties Union had argued that the city was using "a theoretical possibility something terrible is going to happen to cancel the right of people to participate in peaceful protest."

Christian radio deejay claims Satan took over churches

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

Harold Camping, the host of a moderately prominent international Christian radio call-in show, recently told his listeners that Satan has taken over "all" churches and that people of faith should do their worshiping elsewhere.

Apparently, pastors all over the United States are outraged, with some attributing drops in attendance (and contributions) to Camping, whose Oakland, Calif.-based organization reported donations of $12 million in 2000.

Reader's choice

If it hadn't been for the metal detector at the Regina, Saskatchewan, airport, the woman might still wonder why her stomach pains, following June 2002 surgery, were persisting.

When the detector relentlessly beeped but no metal could be found on her, she scheduled an X-ray and discovered that a 12-inch-long surgical retractor had been left inside. (A study published in the New England Journal of Medicine in January estimated that 1,500 items were left inside surgery patients in 2001.)

By 2008, an Olympic sport

Matthew and Elaine Sweetapple recently invented a "game of skill, power, speed and endurance," consisting of a biodegradable ball (smaller than a golf ball) placed in a urinal, to be disintegrated by a urinator (either alone or in "competition").

The product, Peeball, was launched for sale (equivalent of $1.70) late in 2002 by Great Britain's Prostate Cancer Charity, which hopes the novelty will call attention to its cause, in that players with prostate problems are typically poor at the game. Player strategies, basically, are (1) direct stream and (2) intermittent stream.

The entrepreneurial spirit

Two British zoologists and a psychologist started a business consulting firm in November to teach executives to handle risk based on lessons from animal behavior.

Founders Alex Kacelnik and Sir John Krebs (University of Oxford) said it was their work with starlings and crows that told them that animals, including humans, approach risk in similar ways (e.g., a petroleum company exploring for oil is similar to a bird foraging for food).

In December, the British subsidiary of the German firm Condomi selected 10 men from among 10,000 college students across Great Britain to be condom testers, paying them a rate of about $170 per term to test for comfort and convenience, with unlimited supplies (of condoms, not partners).

Newcastle University law student Dave Chapman, one of the 10, told a reporter in December that he thinks the assignment is "to get through as many as humanly possible."

Science on the edge

Two University of Virginia neurologists told a professional conference in December that an egg-sized brain tumor in the orbifrontal cortex region was likely the only explanation why a 40-year-old, appropriately behaving man suddenly became a pedophile, frequently seeking pornography and making subtle advances to children.

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN

After surgery to remove the tumor, the inappropriate urges disappeared for months, but when the urges returned, doctors found that so had the tumor.

Researchers at the Jichi medical school in Tochigi, Japan, told New Scientist magazine in December that they had successfully removed the heads of infant rats, held onto them for 90 minutes, and replanted them onto the blood supply of the thighs of adult rats, with the brains continuing to develop for about three more weeks (e.g., mouths began to move, as if expecting milk).

The researchers say their work is an "excellent model" for brain function in human babies.

People different from us

Robert Covey, 21, said he found a bullet at around 5:30 p.m. on Jan. 11 and decided it would be cool to put it on the ground and shoot at it with his BB gun.

He hit it on the third shot, causing the bullet to explode, sending fragments into his right forearm and left middle finger. He was treated at a Hot Springs, Ark., hospital and released.

Recurring themes

In November 2002, the Appeals Court of Massachusetts rejected a lawsuit by Robert and Anne Krasnecky of Ware, Mass., for "loss of companionship" of their seven pet sheep, which were killed by a neighbor's dog.

The court said "companionship" in the law referred only to humans, even though the Krasneckys considered the sheep their "babies," spent six or seven hours a day with them, gave them names, celebrated their birthdays with special food and balloons, baked snacks for them, bottle-fed them, and allowed them the run of their house.

The District of Calamity

In January, a 72-year-old woman was found dead in her Washington, D.C., apartment the day after a police officer had searched the apartment and failed to notice the woman's leg sticking out from underneath a bed.

Two months earlier, D.C. paramedics had bagged the apparently dead body of a 49-year-old woman, but later, three morgue employees said they detected a slight pulse; however, she died for real a few minutes later.

Osborn, Quackenbush enter race

Pair files to run for student body president, vice president

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Matt Elliott | Collegian

Julie Quackenbush left, junior in industrial engineering, and Tammy Jo Osborn, right, senior in political science and pre-medicine, filed Monday for K-State student body vice president and president, respectively. The primary election will be Feb. 25 and 26.

A second pair of candidates announced the intention to run for student body president and vice president Monday.

Tammy Jo Osborn and Julie Quackenbush said they decided to run for student body president and vice president to improve communication and relationships between students and student government.

"Communication is part of our mission statement," Quackenbush, junior in industrial engineering, said. "In our platform, we're wanting to pull three main groups together – future recruits, alumni and current students."

Osborn, senior in political science and pre-medicine, said they also hope to maintain a family atmosphere at K-State.

"For me, it was a vision of what I want K-State to be," Osborn said. "Everyone comes to K-State for the family atmosphere. As K-State faces a budget crisis and war, we need to make sure we maintain that."

Osborn said she and Quackenbush will focus on five main issues, including improvement and implementation of enrollment and orientation procedures, safety concerns, online portfolios, student lobbying groups and other communication issues.

"We plan to establish a student-led activist group called PULSE to promote involvement in student government," Osborn said. "Students have a lot of opinions but don't know how to get those ideas across to government officials. This group will provide a way for students to address important issues at the government level."

The candidates also suggested implementing a United University Safety Board. Quackenbush said the group would unite representatives from living organizations on and off campus to address safety concerns and discuss a SafeRide program.

Osborn said implementing an online portfolio is also on the agenda.

"This would be a way to foster success of K-State students," she said. "Employers and new students could view this and look at your portfolio and foster mentor relationships."

Osborn said the pair would spend the next couple of weeks visiting different student organizations and students from all colleges to deliver their message.

"There is a quote from John Maxwell that says 'People support what they help create' – we believe in that message," she said.

Quackenbush said student voices should be heard.

"Student government can't do their job if communication doesn't exist," she said. "We're here to serve students – we're not afraid of change."

Osborn agreed.

"As a student, I'm more inclined to look out for what's best for K-State if I feel like K-State is hearing what I have to say," she said.

NATO in crisis after countries block military plans to protect Turkey

By Paul Ames
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium – France, Germany and Belgium blocked NATO efforts Monday to begin planning for possible Iraqi attacks against Turkey, deepening divisions in the alliance over the U.S.-led push to oust Saddam Hussein.

Turkey immediately requested emergency consultations under NATO's mutual defense treaty – or Article 4 – the first time a nation has done so in the alliance's 53-year history.

But those consultations ended Monday without resolution. They were to continue Tuesday at the North Atlantic Council, NATO's political body.

The veto has deepened divisions in the alliance over the Iraq crisis, with American ambassador Nicholas Burns accusing the three of plunging NATO into crisis.

"The majority of the NATO countries reiterated the urgency for NATO to take a decision," NATO Secretary-General Lord Robertson said after the meeting. "Unfortunately we're not yet at the stage where we can achieve consensus."

"It is a matter of enormous consequence for this alliance and therefore people are taking it very seriously," he said.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld stressed the United States and willing allies would go ahead with planning to help Turkey outside of NATO if necessary.

"We are already going about that task," he said at a news conference at the Pentagon. He said Turkey needed aerial surveillance and anti-missile equipment as well as detection devices for biological and chemical weapons.

The dispute deepens divisions in NATO over Iraq. Germany and France have mounted a campaign in the U.N. Security Council to deter the United States and Britain from using force to disarm President Saddam Hussein.

A senior French official at NATO headquarters said Paris saw no reason to change its position on the Turkey preparations until at least Friday, when the U.N. weapons inspectors are due to report to the Security Council in New York.

The United States had lobbied hard for the past three weeks for NATO to begin preparations to protect Turkey in case it came under attack from Iraq. It had won support from 16 of the 19 NATO allies. Turkey, the only NATO nation bordering Iraq, is a likely staging ground for a U.S.-led war.

The plan would include preparations to send Turkey AWACS early warning planes, Patriot missile interceptor batteries and units specialized in counter-germ warfare and anti-poison gas operations.

Just an hour before the order to start the military planning was set to be given Monday morning, France, Germany and Belgium intervened, saying it risked undermining efforts to end the Iraq crisis peacefully.

"It would signify that we have already entered into the logic of war, that ... any chance, any initiative to still resolve the conflict in a peaceful way was gone," Belgian Foreign Minister Louis Michel said.

Burns, the U.S. ambassador, called the three countries' move "a most unfortunate decision."

"Because of their actions, NATO is now facing a crisis of credibility," Burns said.

Lord Robertson said that the atmosphere in the day's meeting of alliance ambassadors was "very heated."

After the rejection, Turkey invoked Article 4 of the NATO charter, which binds the 19 allies to talks when one perceives a threat to its "territorial integrity, political independence or security."

In Washington, Secretary of State Colin Powell said the treaty bound all allies to defend Turkey. "I hope that NATO will now realize that they have an obligation to assist a NATO member," he said.

Pentagon orders commercial airlines to help move troops

By Pauline Jelinek
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – For only the second time in a half-century, the U.S. military has activated a reserve fleet of commercial aircraft to move troops to a potential war zone. Both times, the destination has been the Persian Gulf.

Pentagon officials said 13 flights were scheduled to fly troops Monday after Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld mobilized the Civil Reserve Air Fleet.

The fleet was established in 1951. The only other time it was activated was in 1990-91, in the buildup to the Persian Gulf War and during the war itself.

Rumsfeld on Saturday authorized the first stage of the mobilization, meaning officials can call up 78 aircraft – 47 passenger planes and 31 wide-body cargo planes. For now, Air Force Gen. John Handy, head of the U.S. Transportation Command, has enough cargo planes, so he called up only the passenger aircraft, command spokesman Navy Capt. Steve Honda said Monday.

There are 11 carriers signed up for this first stage of mobilization, Honda said by phone from command offices at Scott Air Force Base in Illinois.

They are American Airlines, American Trans Air, Continental Airlines, Delta Air Lines, Hawaiian Airlines, North American Airlines, Northwest Airlines, Omni Air International, United Airlines, US Airways and World Airways.

The transportation command relies heavily on contracts with the commercial transport industry – sea, air and land – to move troops, equipment and supplies worldwide in support of the nation's defense.

OPINION

TO THE POINT

Elections should proceed easily without glitches

The 2003 SGA elections should be smooth sailing this year.

At least, they should if Election Day is anything like the mock elections SGA conducted recently.

Last year's online vendor, iBallot.com, caused many problems, some of which violated election regulation codes.

SGA and the Elections Committee's decision to have an in-house balloting system was a wise one. Not only is the system saving the university money, it also ensures more efficiency.

Conducting the mock election showed SGA's preparedness for such a crisis as last year's elections. SGA even has established an outline of how to deal with a crisis, if such an issue should arise again this year.

The Elections Committee was subjected to much ridicule last year for its inability to handle the problems of the Student Senate elections. Its recent actions have showed a commitment to maintaining the integrity of K-State and its student government elections.

TERROR PARANOIA

Fear of attacks in America puts unwarranted label of terrorism on all recent tragedies

LINDSEY PRAECHTER

Illustration by Jeff Yeung | COLLEGIAN

What would I do without President Bush? If he hadn't reassured me that the Columbia tragedy wasn't a terrorist attack, I would have signed up for the draft immediately.

There was an ice patch in front of my door, too. I bet that was bin Laden himself.

I have never seen such a paranoia that has spread through the United States as the fear of terrorism has. It seems like every day someone has blamed something on al-Qaeda or Saddam Hussein.

I will not down-play the tragedies that have occurred or been blamed on al-Qaeda, Hussein, or other terrorist groups, but I think that the American government is always looking for a scapegoat and pointing fingers before anything is proven.

Who can trust a terrorist group even when it claims responsibility? Terrorist groups all over the world take credit for any tragedy they can get their hands on. It isn't even worth listening to anymore.

Without terrorism to blame, sometimes buildings catch on fire, and sometimes machinery fails due to mechanical errors.

An error occurred on the space shuttle Columbia. The public can count on NASA, which houses some of the most brilliant people on the planet, to search for answers, but it may never be fully explained.

Maybe I am naïve, but until Bush announced that terrorism was not to blame, I didn't even consider it as a possible cause for the Columbia's disintegration over Texas. Columbia was entering the earth's atmosphere. Did people actually think that Hussein had a missile launched at it or something?

Bush is preparing to fight a war that could last for decades to secure himself for another election and to calm the American population's fears. The fears stem from Sept. 11, 2001.

After that attack, the flame was fed by Bush and his political counterparts and secured the fear of terrorism for many Americans. However, it must be considered that politicians build popularity through crisis situations when they take a strong leadership role.

The public demands answers from its leaders, and Bush is answering how he pleases. We aren't stupid. We know that many things, from terrorism to Cheney's health condition, are not revealed completely. But I can assure you that terrorism certainly isn't the answer to every tragedy. Neither is war.

The United States is working overtime to see that attacks are detected and prevented. Awareness has increased significantly, and all sorts of people are under the government's microscope.

Stifle the flame of paranoia and be patient, wait for the facts and don't jump to conclusions.

Don't let politics blind you from your instincts. Think for yourself.

Body-part exposure part of gender inequality

PAUL RESTIVO

"Don't miss out. Fraternity boys exposing everything! Get a glimpse of their pimply patooties as they reveal their luscious bodies. Order now. Only $12.95. 'Fraternity Boys Gone Wild'!"

Have you ever heard of this? Yeah, neither have I. Not that I would want to sit down with my KY and turn on the latest fraternity boy smut flick, but my problem lies with the gender inequalities.

What is it about women that allows them to flash me their boobies? What is it that makes me excited to see boobies?

More importantly, what is it about men that doesn't allow them to flash women their penises? What is it that doesn't excite women to see screaming guys whip out their tallywhackers during Mardi Gras?

No beads for that, fellas.

I asked around on this one. Apparently, it is a pubic-hair issue. Society doesn't accept pubic hair as well as it does bare boobs. This is all according to one woman, though.

My question then is, if I shave my privates, will I be received better if I drop my drawers and flop around the room hollering?

I'm thinking not.

Penises are ugly. Boobies are not. Even girls think penises are ugly. If penises were considered pretty, we also would have sexy lingerie with which to flaunt our members. But this isn't the case.

Women get all the glory as far as sexiness is concerned. They get the silk panties (not that I want silk panties). They get the flowery, lace bras (not that I want a flowery, lace bra).

There's only so much I can do to be sexy. I can style my hair, but if I style it too much, I'm gay.

I can wear boot-cut jeans and a gap shirt, but if I dress like this every day, I'm gay.

How can I be sexy, not be a fem, wear flip-flops, and read Anne Tyler novels all at the same time without being considered gay?

It's a dilemma men face every day.

Men are required to stay in this middle ground of society. Being too sexy (or even showing the desire to be sexy) can be considered too feminine, but when a guy wears his wife-beater and sits on the couch kicking the dog and sipping Natty Light, he's labeled as "such a man," or a slob.

Women think being a woman is hard? Maybe. But being a guy can be tough. It is no coincidence that the suicide rate among men is higher than women. It's a tough life.

Society expects so much of men. If a man is a stay-at-home dad, it can be looked down upon. If a woman is a stay-at-home mom, it's cute.

But what it all comes down to is me wanting to be able to streak when I want and be well-received for doing so.

I should not be discriminated against because I don't have boobies to show.

The day "Fraternity Boys Gone Wild" hits the video stores is the day men have made one more step up society's ladder of gender equality.

Columnist shows lack of racial knowledge, disrespect to minorities

Editor,

I am an African-American female here in Graduate School at Kansas State University, and I thought that Paul Restivo's column titled "He's a wanksta" was highly offensive and showed no intellectual thought on his part. The fact that he would write about his experience as if it was culturally based shows a lack of research.

To write about such an event during a month where numerous African-Americans are being highlighted for their contributions to America shows that he is insensitive and yet inattentive to his surroundings. The truth of the matter is that there are not only prominent African-American males in this country that he could have used to delve further into the "black culture," but there are outstanding African-American males that teach on this campus and attend this school who are nothing like the people that he talked of in his column.

Maybe the column was written to provide humor for some, but it has instead allowed someone to glorify ignorant behavior at the expense of myself and other African-Americans on this campus, and that is something that should be seen as intolerable at a prominent university like K-State. If ignorance is bliss, Paul is living the good life.

Israel restricts border entry

By Mark Lavie
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM – Israel clamped a total closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip on Monday, banning all Palestinians from entering Israel, citing warnings of Palestinian attacks.

Earlier Monday, Israeli troops killed two suspected Palestinian militants, including an unarmed fugitive, and caught a would-be suicide bomber who hid an explosives-laden suitcase in a hotel.

Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz canceled measures aimed at easing restrictions during the Muslim feast of the sacrifice holiday this week, the ministry said.

Quoting unidentified military sources, Army Radio said there were reports that militants intend to carry out terror attacks in the coming days.

Total closures are infrequent, though Israel has severely restricted access for Palestinians to Israel throughout 28 months of Israeli-Palestinian fighting.

The military had said it would ease restrictions for workers to enter Israel and would allow Palestinians over age 45 to pray at a hotly disputed holy site in the Old City of Jerusalem during the holiday.

"The defense minister also instructed the (army) to exhibit extra sensitivity toward the Palestinian population during the holiday," said a military statement issued earlier Monday.

Canceling the orders meant that Israeli roadblocks on West Bank roads would remain in place, preventing Palestinians from moving around freely to visit relatives or work.

The restrictions have severely hurt the Palestinian economy and Palestinian morale since the restrictions were imposed shortly after the violence erupted in September 2000.

Before that, more than 100,000 Palestinians used to cross into Israel to work every day, a vital source of income for the impoverished territories. About 20,000 Palestinians now have permits to work in Israel, but in times of total closures, even those with permits must stay home.

Palestinians contend the measures are collective punishment that harm the innocent; Israel maintains they are necessary for security.

During the current conflict, more than 80 Palestinian suicide bombers have killed more than 300 Israelis.

In Monday's violence, a Palestinian fugitive, Imad Mabruk, jumped from the roof of his home in the al-Ain refugee camp near Nablus to the roof of a nearby building to escape soldiers who called on him to surrender, said his cousin, Yousef Mabruk.

Mabruk hid on the roof for several hours and at about 5 a.m. gunshots were heard.

Shortly after the soldiers left, the family found Mabruk's body, riddled with gunshot wounds, on the roof, Yousef Mabruk said.

Family of K-State alumni helps revive war bonds

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was 1944, and many Americans were looking for ways to support their country during World War II.

Five-year-old Randi Dale's contribution was dressing as Uncle Sam and promoting War Bonds.

More than 50 years later, Dale, a Manhattan resident and K-State graduate, is wearing the costume again.

Now, however, she is joined by her daughter, Susan Dale and granddaughter, Anastasia Richardson.

Collectively, they call themselves the Freedom Girls. Their mission is to promote the newly renamed Patriot Bonds.

"Common people have the right to invest in America," Susan, a K-State graduate, said. "The only way we can do that is with savings bonds."

Patriot Bonds are Series EE savings bonds purchased through financial institutions or over the Internet at the Savings Bonds Direct Web site, www.publicdebt.treas.gov.

Proceeds from the sale of all treasury securities, including Patriot Bonds, are deposited in the general fund and spent according to law. The funds will contribute to the recovery and war efforts.

The bonds can be purchased in denominations of $50, $75, $100, $200, $500, $1,000, $5,000 and $10,000. The purchase price is one-half the face amount. For example, a $100 Patriot Bond costs $50.

$1.98 million in Patriot Bonds were sold in the first year.

Susan credits her then 5-year-old daughter, Anastasia, for the revival of the Freedom Girls.

A few weeks after Sept. 11, Susan was watching TV with her daughter when coverage of the attacks and the New York firefighters came on.

She tried to change the channel, but Anastasia asked her not to.

"She said she wanted to be a fireman, because she wanted to help those people," Susan said. "I was so pleased that she understood the firefighters were heroes and the people in New York needed help."

Susan said all she could think of was the cover of "Popular Photography" that her mother appeared on to promote War Bonds during WWII.

Randi, who was a child model, said the war bond cover was one of the only photos she remembers taking as a child.

"And I remember walking through Grand Central Station and seeing my picture plastered everywhere," she said. "I remember being really excited about it at that age."

Susan found a black and white copy of the cover and showed it to Anastasia.

"'This is your grandma,' I told her, 'and this is how she helped,'" Susan said.

"Anastasia told me that's what she was going to do – sell war bonds just like her grandma."

At that time, there were no war bonds.

A few days later, though, CNN reported that President Bush wanted to reinstate them.

Susan started calling the Treasury Department and Congressmen to tell them they were volunteering their images to the department to promote the bonds.

"They told me that as Americans we could do whatever we wanted to, but they themselves were not actively promoting the bonds," she said.

So, the trio has been trying to create the bonds on their own.

The Freedom Girls have also created a $10 promotional poster. They hope to use the proceeds to create inspirational war-bond postcards to U.S. soldiers stationed overseas. They also held a Patriot Bond drive at the State Fair in Oklahoma.

Anastasia and Susan also are present at deployments near Tulsa – where they live – to let the soldiers know their efforts and work are appreciated.

It hasn't been cheap for them to do, though, Susan said.

So far, they have spent over $13,000 of their own money.

She works three jobs now to help the group fund the promotions. It doesn't seem to be enough sometimes, though, she said.

"I'll sell M&Ms on the sidewalk if I have to," she said. "That's how important this is to me."

And since January, the Freedom Girls are facing a new challenge, Randi said.

The Treasury Department's Bureau of the Public Debt has submitted a request to eliminate program funding for the savings bonds marketing and investor education program beginning Oct. 1.

Susan said after that bonds will go completely electronic. And volunteers would not be able to promote them.

"We are trying to save the bonds," she said. "My 6-year-old daughter knows this is important, and I hope the rest of America does too."

Colorado (14-7, 4-4) vs K-State (11-10, 2-6)

FINISHING THE JOB

Men start 2nd half of conference slate with new focus after evaluating play

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a brand-new season according to Coach Jim Wooldridge.

After eight grueling conference games, including four against teams in the Big 12's top six, K-State (11-10, 2-6) begins its second half of league play at 7 tonight against Colorado (14-7, 4-4), looking to turn it all around.

"We still remain optimistic that we can turn this thing around in league play," Wooldridge said. "If we can make some improvements, we can finish strong."

Wooldridge said on Monday's Big 12 teleconference that the team had a chance to sit down and evaluate its play so far.

He said the meeting was productive because it allowed everyone – players and coaches – to refocus on the task at hand.

"I think just letting them know that the world hadn't ended and we got games ahead and opportunities ahead," Wooldridge said. "We're certainly not out of the possibilities of finishing higher than we sit right now. But it's going to take good play and strong character."

The Wildcats' character could have easily been smashed after dropping winnable contests to No. 11 Kansas and No. 6 Oklahoma in the last week.

But K-State's final eight games will include just two top-25 opponents in Missouri and Texas.

It will also include four games at

K-State's remaining opponents

Kansas, Oklahoma and Oklahoma State are all in the past. K-State doesn't have to play these top-15 teams any more. Here's who the Wildcats do face in the conference's second half.

Colorado | Tonight
K-State lost 69-63 to the Buffaloes on Jan. 15. In that game, K-State trailed by seven at the half and couldn't get over the hump as Colorado sank eight of 10 free-throws in the second half.

Missouri | Feb. 15, March 1
One of two teams the Wildcats haven't seen yet, the Tigers are fifth in the conference standings after beating Texas Tech 82-73 on Sunday.

Baylor | Feb. 19
Not able to get past the Bears in Waco, Texas, last season, the Wildcats managed to nip Baylor in overtime in the first round of the 2002 Big 12 Tournament. Baylor has won just one conference game so far, against Texas A&M.

Iowa State | Feb. 22, March 8
The Cyclones and Wildcats are currently tied for ninth place in the Big 12. Iowa State's two wins have come over Nebraska and Baylor. The Cyclones' six losses have come by an average of more than 15 points, though.

at Nebraska | Feb. 25
After losing to K-State by 24 on Jan. 22, the Huskers still haven't managed to get a second win in the Big 12.

at Texas | March 4
Quite possibly K-State's toughest game in the second half. Texas is ranked No. 3 in the nation. But the Wildcats did beat the Longhorns 71-70 last season at Bramlage Coliseum.

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN
K-State's Matt Siebrandt had 10 points in the Wildcats' loss to KU on Saturday. Siebrandt will look to help K-State snap a four-game losing streak tonight when the Wildcats play Colorado at 7 p.m. in Bramlage Coliseum.

Staff and wire reports

Basketball | Ohlde league's best last week
K-State junior Nicole Ohlde earned her second Big 12 Player of the Week honor of the season and the third of her career, the league office announced Monday.

Ohlde averaged 23 points, 7.5 rebounds, 4.0 assists and 36.5 minutes per contest in Wildcat wins over Missouri and Baylor last week.

Volleyball | Cats selected for tournament
K-State will join 2002 Final Four participants USC, Hawaii and Florida in the ninth annual State Farm Women's Volleyball Classic, Aug. 22-23 in Honolulu.

The announcement was made Monday by the National Association of Collegiate Women Athletics Administrators.

Freshman adjusts after 4-game losing streak

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the 2002-03 K-State men's basketball media guide, freshman Marques Hayden said the one thing no one knows about him is how much he likes to win.

He averaged 17 points per game as a senior last season at Oklahoma's Putnam City High School.

He led his team to a state championship and was named to the McDonalds All-State team. He was a 2001 and 2002 All-State selection, and he was named the Big City and Metro Athletic Conference 2002 Player of the Year.

He was voted one of the nation's best 100 recruits by three recruiting services.

Marques Hayden knows about winning.

Or at least that's what he thought when rolling into Manhattan seven months ago.

Now Hayden is the Wildcats' sixth man. Usually the first player off the bench, he has seen significant action in all the Cats' games this season.

But for the freshman who loves to win, the Cats' four-game losing streak is a new experience.

"It's a little tough, but I see the overall picture," he said. "In high school, I won by 30 or 40 points a game. You didn't really feel the true meaning of winning a ballgame."

Hayden has just begun his career as a Wildcat, but already the freshman has been transformed. He said winning at K-State is different than it ever has been.

"When you come out here and you play 40 minutes of absolute hell and you get that W –

NASCAR not a true sport

The apocalypse is upon us.

While shopping at the grocery store a few days ago, I stumbled upon a new cereal so stupid that I had to look twice to make sure it was actually true.

Was it a cartoon-character cereal?

Nope.

Was it a new health-nut cereal?

Uh-uh.

TOM FONTANA

It was from NASCAR legend (if such a title exists) Richard Petty – The Richard Petty 43's. When I think of appetizing cereal, the last thing that comes to mind is NASCAR. Imagine rolling out of bed and staring down at your bowl of 43's, picturing the mouth-watering smell of burning rubber. Why not substitute motor oil for milk?

The saddest part is this stuff will sell like crazy. NASCAR fans are insane. It has blown up during the past few years, and for what? To watch a group of cars drive around, occasionally crash and then to watch a checkered flag as somebody crosses the finish line?

This is the wonderful world of NASCAR. I can't imagine anything I would rather do than watch a group of out-of-shape men with southern accents drive in a circle for three hours.

NASCAR kicks off its 54th season this weekend in Daytona, Fla., where the Daytona 500 will give mullets across the country an event to celebrate.

I feel sorry for Florida. Normally home to New York transplants over the age of 80, Daytona Beach will be taken over by the cut-off-shorts-wearing and cheap-beer-drinking crowd.

The thing that gets me is fans of NASCAR consider it a sport. But to qualify as a sport, something athletic must be done. Driving a car, albeit a much faster car than we mortals drive in the friendly confines of Manhattan, does not make you an athlete.

This argument really gets to the fans of this craziness called NASCAR. Is it that big of a deal if we call it a competition? These drivers are many things, but an athlete they are not.

NASCAR fans are nuts about this stuff. If K-State fans had this passion about the men's basketball team, we could have kept countless Jayhawk fans out of Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday. Instead, we were forced to hear "rock, chalk, Jayhawk" for the 20th year in our building. But I'll save that rant for another column.

While suffering through a race last year on a television that I had no control over, I heard a fan utter this hilarious statement:

Golf team struggling in first spring event

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After taking a few months off, the K-State men's golf team was slightly rusty at the Rice Intercollegiate on Monday.

K-State sits in ninth place after 36 holes, shooting a 605 in the first two rounds. Coach Tim Norris said although the team struggled, he was happy with the play of the Cats' two freshmen in Cypress, Texas.

"It wasn't a great day for us, but overall I was really pleased with the two freshmen, Josh Persons and Ben Kern," he said. "Both struggled a little in the first round but came back and shot 73 this afternoon."

Persons, after struggling in the opening round with a 5-over-par 78, bounced back and shot a 73 in the afternoon. The score places Persons 27th prior to today's final-round action.

After a first-round 79, Kern matched Persons' 73 and finds himself in a tie for 33rd place.

As a team, the Cats opened the day with a 20-over-par score of 308 during the morning's first 18 holes.

K-State cut 11 shots off its morning score in the afternoon, though, to finish the day with a second-round 297. Norris said even though the first day of the spring season wasn't that great, he was glad the team improved in the second round.

"Our guys made a nice improvement," he said. "We're only 10 shots out of fifth place heading into tomorrow."

Junior Greg Douglas led K-State in the first round, firing a 2-over-par 74 to land in a tie for 13th place heading into the second round.

In the second round, Douglas struggled a bit, shooting a 5-over-par 77 and finished in a tie for 27th going into today's final round.

"We've got a lot to play for tomorrow," Norris said, "and the Cats' will be up for the challenge."

Trouble in Texas

K-State had a hard time finding its stroke at the Rice Intercollegiate on Monday, finishing in ninth place after 36 holes.

NASA finds key part in explaining shuttle crash

By Marcia Dunn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SPACE CENTER, Houston – NASA said Monday it has recovered part of Columbia's left wing, a section thought to have played a major role in the space shuttle disaster.

It was not clear where the piece fit in the wing, said Michael Kostelnik, a deputy associate administrator. He said engineers were analyzing the piece at Barksdale Air Force Base, La., after it was found east of Fort Worth.

"I think they have identified that they have at least once piece of the left wing," Kostelnik said of searchers.

The piece included some carbon-carbon tile, an extremely dense material that covered the leading edge of the wing, he said.

The fragment could be important, given that all the trouble apparently began in the left wing during the final minutes of Columbia's flight Feb. 1. The shuttle broke up above Texas as it returned to Earth, killing all seven people aboard.

NASA said it has also found the cover of one of the two landing gear compartments, another potentially critical piece because a temperature surge inside the left wheel well was the first sign of trouble. But officials do not yet know whether it is from the right or left side of the shuttle.

NASA Administrator Sean O'Keefe said debris would be taken to Kennedy Air Force Base in Cape Canaveral on Monday and Tuesday, where it will be cataloged and assembled.

They will reassemble as much of the shuttle as they can in a hangar on the Kennedy grounds, and an independent board investigating the disaster will have offices in the hangar, said Bill Readdy, associated administrator for space flight at NASA.

Kostelnik said engineers are still looking at high resolution photographs of Columbia taken by a powerful Air Force telescope camera, but said "no engineering judgment" has been made on the images.

One photo, taken a minute or two before Columbia broke up, is drawing special interest. A dark gray streak can be seen trailing the left wing, and the leading edge of that wing appears to be jagged.

He said resolution on the photos were no better than what was released to the public on Friday.

Kostelnick said the agency is also looking at data collected by weather and Federal Aviation Authority radar to determine whether debris or a weather phenomenon could have been factors in the accident.

The Columbia investigation board held a series of meetings Monday in an office near Johnson Space Center, as its pace picked up. The chairman, Harold Gehman Jr. – a retired admiral who investigated the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole – said two to three teams of experts would analyze all the pictures and video taken of Columbia as it flew over California, Arizona, New Mexico and, finally, Texas.

Study: college students' stress levels increasing over time

Study shows depression, emotional problems are increasingly common

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

College students are scoring off the charts when it comes to stress tests.

More complex emotional problems are being experienced now than they were 13 years ago, said Sherry Benton, assistant director of training at Lafene Health Center.

At least that seems to be the trend at K-State, according to a study done by Benton.

Benton said the statistics used for the study were collected over the last 13 years from more than 13,257 students.

"Across the years the percentage of students with more serious problems has gone up dramatically," she said.

Benton said the shift in problems has been changing the most within the last decade.

"In the first three years of the study, we saw the biggest problem students came in with was relationship problems," she said, "but in 1994 it changed to stress and anxiety becoming the biggest issue with students."

Benton said stress and anxiety have continued to be the number one problem among K-State students.

"I really believe school is a lot more stressful now," she said. "People feel pressure because it is more competitive, and it's harder to pay for."

Carla Jones, senior associate dean of student life, said the increase in students experiencing stress reflects an increase in awareness around campus.

"If there is an increase, it may simply be in the number of students who know where to go to get help now," she said. "The more faculty and staff know about where to send students, the more students will go."

Benton said the staff at Lafene has been doing all it can to make students aware of its services.

"We teach stress management classes," she said, "and we offer workshops to provide students with the help they need."

However, some stress is to be expected in college, Jones said.

In addition to an increase in students with stress, Benton said Lafene has also seen an increase in students with suicidal thoughts or tendencies.

"We had 28 people in the first year of the study for suicidal thoughts," she said, "but last year we had 96."

Benton said that by reaching out to students, some of these numbers will begin to decrease.

Reaching out to students of all levels is important, Benton said, but sometimes it is helpful to target certain age groups.

"We are far more likely to get juniors and seniors coming to see us than freshmen and sophomores," she said, "We try to get into as many freshmen level classes to make them aware of it."

Benton said students should be aware that each student at K-State is able to use three free sessions at Lafene per year.

"We usually only see a student five or six times," Benton said. "After that, they feel like they have gotten what they need, and it can make a major difference for a student."

Jones said that sometimes students are not willing to receive help.

"It takes a student identifying themselves as someone who needs help and then getting it," she said.

Jones also said extracurricular activities can help a student who is feeling depressed.

"Helping to find activities for students is important," she said, "so they are not sitting alone, and so they are getting the social activity they need."

Federal judge upholds march refusal

By Larry Neumeister
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK– Citing safety concerns in "this time of heightened security," a federal judge Monday upheld the city's refusal to allow anti-war demonstrators to march past the United Nations on Saturday.

U.S. District Judge Barbara S. Jones said the demonstrators' First Amendment rights were not violated by the city's decision to confine the protest to a plaza near the U.N. complex.

"The city's restriction on marching is not a restriction on pure speech, but rather a restriction on the manner in which plaintiff may communicate its message," Jones wrote in regards to the demonstrators.

The protest is being organized by United for Peace and Justice, a coalition that is sponsoring rallies throughout the world on Saturday.

Leslie Cagan, a leader of the coalition, said the group will appeal the judge's ruling.

"We are outraged that Judge Jones did not see fit to uphold our fundamental constitutional right of the people to engage in peaceful marches," Cagan said.

It is yet another example of the damage that is being done to our constitutional democracy in a post 9-11 environment."

In her ruling, Jones noted that the United Nations was "uniquely sensitive among locations in New York City because of its function, our country's treaty obligations and its history as a terrorist target."

She said that since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack on the World Trade Center, the city has banned all demonstrations, parades or other public events in front of the United Nations.

"This policy is all inclusive, makes no reference to the content of the regulated speech and does not distinguish between event organizers or their views," she said.

K.C. Chiefs chaplain tells students to help others

Alumnus shares life experiences; encourages students to change world

Bernard Franklin speaks at the Leadership Recognition Day reception on Monday at the K-State Alumni Center. Franklin was the first black student body president at K-State. Zach Long COLLEGIAN

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

You're being prepared for significant leadership, and the world is calling you, a chaplain for the Kansas City Chiefs told his audience Monday night.

"Friends, there are no accidents," said Bernard Franklin, K-State's first black student body president. "Things don't just happen. You're here for a reason."

Franklin spoke at the Blue Key Leadership Recognition Reception in the K-State Alumni Center Ballroom.

The reception is an annual event sponsored by Blue Key senior leadership fraternity to recognize outstanding leaders and their advisers.

Franklin has helped many people throughout his life, he said. He now is pastor of City Church in Kansas City, Mo.

He made history as the first black student ever elected as student body president at K-State.

Franklin said he came to K-State as part of a class with fewer than 300 black students. He said he complained to his adviser about the lack of hair and skin products available to African-Americans.

"She told me, 'You gotta get involved. You gotta get in there and tell us how to make things better,'" Franklin said. "Little did I know that I was being prepared. It wasn't all about academics.

"A college degree is about your academics. Very little is said about your contribution to your community."

Franklin said he feels there are three goals that every human should have in common.

"Your first mission is to honor your creator, your higher being. Take that and define it into your own faith framework," Franklin said. "Your second mission is to do all you can day by day to make the world a better place than when your mother and father first occupied this space," he said. "I want you to make that commitment today.

"You must also share your unique talent. When you get your talent, you can work 15-hour days because you love it. You can afford to work out of your heart."

When people live up to their destiny or place in Earth, the riches they need to live by will find them, Franklin said.

"I want you to pause today and say, 'Money doesn't drive me. Money doesn't matter when you're in pain," he said. "You gotta take that pain somewhere else. You gotta have some commitment to faith."

Franklin made history a second time when he became the youngest person ever appointed to the Kansas State Board of Regents.

"I was very excited to hear him speak," Anna Schwieger, senior in life sciences, said. "It would have been wonderful to hear this as a freshman."

Franklin said he sees too many college graduates without critical thinking skills and too many people who work only for money.

Peter Carter, junior in biology, said these issues aren't addressed enough.

"He brought up some points that people usually hide," Carter said. "They're valid points that people need to talk about, even among friends. He challenged young people to use the potential they have to help others."

Carter said he felt he should challenge his friends.

"I liked that he encouraged you to make other people better – to give of yourself and of your time to help people," Carter said. "And hopefully it's something that you like."

Rumsfeld sees rising dangers in North Korea

By Robert Burns
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – The official Bush administration view of North Korea's nuclear breakout is that, while troubling, it does not amount to a crisis. Yet that is exactly the word that comes to mind when Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld talks about its dangers.

To Rumsfeld, it's not simply a matter of North Korea becoming a nuclear weapons state. The CIA estimates that the communist-ruled country has had one or two nuclear weapons for nearly a decade.

In his view the bigger danger is that, by cranking up a nuclear weapons production complex that had been idled under U.N. seal since 1994, a cash-starved North Korea could produce enough nuclear materials to sell to terrorist states or terror networks who might make America a target.

"It's pretty clear that if they restart that reprocessing plant, which they seemed to indicate they intend to do, that they could have nuclear materials sufficient to make an additional six or eight weapons," Rumsfeld told delegates to a European security conference on Saturday.

He said they could have that many extra weapons by May or June. As "the world's leading proliferator" of ballistic missile technology, it would not be hard to imagine that North Korea would sell some of that extra nuclear material on the black market to al-Qaeda or Iraq, Rumsfeld said.

That, in Rumsfeld's view, is a frightening example of the nexus between terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. It's a principal basis of his argument for why Iraq must be disarmed sooner rather than later, before it acquires a nuclear weapon.

There's still another worry about North Korea's nuclear ambitions beyond the obvious possibility that it could launch a nuclear attack or blackmail others by threatening one. There is a fear that a nuclear-armed North Korea could lead others in the region, including Japan, Taiwan and South Korea – which once had a nuclear program but gave it up – to decide they, too, must have the ultimate weapon.

Although Rumsfeld and the U.S. military are preoccupied with preparing for war against Iraq, to begin perhaps as early as this month or next, it was clear from the defense secretary's comments in Europe last week that he has decided a case can be made for confronting North Korea in some way.

President Bush had said a number of times in recent weeks that the United States has no intention of invading North Korea, although on Friday he mentioned that "all options are on the table."

Rumsfeld has not suggested a military solution to the North Korean problem, but he has mentioned that the North Koreans – like the Iraqis – are on the State Department's list of terrorist states. Both, along with Iran, are in the "axis of evil" that Bush condemned a year ago.

In an interview with reporters traveling with him Friday, Rumsfeld predicted that North Korea would become "within a year or two or three" the leading example of why, in his view, the set of international treaties and agreements designed to stop the spread of nuclear weapons is failing.

"It's going to take an enormous effort across the globe," he said.

War with North Korea would be a risky proposition. The country has an extraordinarily large and well-concealed arsenal of artillery within range of South Korea's capital, Seoul, as well as stocks of chemical and possibly biological weapons not to mention the one or two nuclear weapons.

New York hospital releases man with bubonic plague after leg amputation

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK – A New Mexico man who was hospitalized in New York City for more than three months with bubonic plague left the hospital to fly home on Monday, a spokesman said.

John Tull left Beth Israel Medical Center at about 7 a.m., hospital spokesman Mike Quane said. Tull was admitted to Beth Israel on Nov. 5.

Tull, whose feet were amputated due to extensive tissue damage, will begin physical therapy in Albuquerque, N.M., Quane said.

Disease investigators believe Tull and his wife, Lucinda Marker, contracted plague from infected fleas on their Santa Fe, N.M., ranch. They became ill after arriving in New York on Nov. 1 for vacation.

Marker was released after less than two weeks in the hospital.

On a Web site she established to update friends on her husband's progress, Marker posted an update Sunday that described three months filled with "very late night conversations with doctors, sleepless nights, tears of great relief and of sadness."

"Love to all and we shall return to this fine city soon," Marker wrote. "Thank you for taking care of us."

The bubonic plague cases were the first seen in New York City in at least a century. About 10 to 20 people usually get plague each year in the United States, mostly in the West.

COMPASSION Love Freedom BIRTH

Pulitzer Prize-winning photo display captures life, provokes emotions

By Rachel Krier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Covering her mouth with her hand and feeling her heart pound, Robyn Pauly moved gently from picture to picture trying to take it all in. Her eyes went from the portrait of a starving woman in Africa with her child, to a man being burned alive, to a rescue team saving a teenage girl caught in a flood.

The images she saw were those of the Pulitzer Prize photograph exhibit, "Capture the Moment," which is now showing through March at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. Pauly, sophomore in computer science, toured the exhibit with her Alpha Chi Omega sorority sisters last Wednesday as part of their fine arts appreciation month.

The exhibit features prize-winning photographs from 1942 to 2002, taken in all parts of the world.

"They're amazing, breathtaking and heartbreaking," Pauly said. "You don't see stuff like this here, but people need to see this. This is the world we live in."

Unlike other exhibitions that have donned the wall of the Beach Museum, this display is not art imitating life, but rather life itself.

The reality of the display allows it to affect more people than other forms of art, said Katherine Schlageck, education and public service supervisor of the museum.

"There is something immediate and powerful about photography because it's a real person, at a real moment in time," Schlageck said. "When you look at the faces of the people in the photo you are seeing very unmasked emotion."

The photos have "stopping-power," as Cody Holub, freshman in open-option, discovered when he went to tour the exhibit for his leadership class.

"I thought I'd just come in here and glance around because I am not really into museums or anything, but I've stopped and read about 10 of the stories with the photos so far," Holub said. "It's more graphic than I expected."

After viewing the exhibit, Holub said he felt different, with a better knowledge of history and what people have gone through.

When Aaron McCaffery, senior in ceramics, had finished taking in all of the Pulitzer winners, he said he recalled feeling rather helpless.

"It's a little shocking. It really shows humanity in the best and worst ways. It's a very telling show," McCaffery said. "It's overwhelming. There are so many problems, and the world is such a big place what can you do?"

Due to its ability to overwhelm, McCaffery said he suggests making several trips to the museum to absorb everything in segments at a time. Even spending a few hours in the exhibit might not be enough time to get through it all, he said.

Schlageck said that museum attendance has tripled because of the Pulitzer display, reaching about 300 people a weekend from all over the state and some out-of-state visitors.

But not all visitors have responded to the exhibit with similar enthusiasm. In the exhibit comment book, one person posed the question, "Where are all the positive beautiful pictures? Too much of the shots are focused on the negative."

Others in the comment book also have challenged the behavior of the photographers, asking if it was right to take pictures of such horrible events rather than doing something at the time.

The extended captions that accompany the photos help to answer this question. For instance, with the photo of the little starving African girl trying to crawl to shelter with a vulture standing behind her, the photographer chased the bird away after taking the shot, but was told not to touch any of the famine victims due to the danger of transmitting diseases.

Anne FLynn, sophomore in apparel and textile, stops to examine a Pulitzer Prize winning photograph while visiting the exhibit at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

With one of the more well-known photos with the Vietnamese children running from a Napalm bomb exploding on their village, the photographer did help the children to safety and has kept in contact with one girl since then.

This last instance is rare, said Edward Seaton, editor in chief of the Manhattan Mercury.

"In most cases, the photographer was not in a position to do anything about the situation anyways," Seaton said. "The journalist's job is to record, not to interfere. [Photojournalism] brings reality to people, which is awfully important. In that sense they are continuing to serve the public."

Seaton, who was a member of the Pulitzer Prize board for nine years, made it possible for the exhibit to stop in Manhattan because of his early awareness of the traveling tour.

"The exhibit is booked now through 2005," Seaton said. "We were fortunate to get it this early or to get it at all."

When the exhibit leaves the museum in March, it will head for North Carolina.

Schlageck said the display returning to Kansas is unlikely and that students need to take advantage of this opportunity while they still can.

Photography exhibit events

The Pulitzer Prize photo display will be at the Beach Museum through March 30.

Patron of American living artists writes memoir, reminisces

At 99, Roy R. Neuberger proudly talks about his lifelong devotion to a goal: He has donated more than 500 paintings and sculptures from his collection to 70 museums and colleges around the country, and another 950 to a museum named after him in Purchase, N.Y.

His philanthropy has benefited such institutions as the Metropolitan Museum of Art, the Whitney Museum of American Art and the Brooklyn Museum of Art, and academic museums at Vassar College, Yale University, Mount Holyoke College and the University of Michigan.

Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit opens

The Public Museum of Grand Rapids is billing its new show as "an exhibition of biblical proportions" — and for good reason.

Portions of the Dead Sea Scrolls, a priceless collection of biblical manuscripts about 2,000 years old, will be displayed at the organization's Van Andel Museum Center beginning Sunday.

The show, which runs through June 1, will provide Westerners with a rare glimpse of the sacred writings. Fragments of a dozen different scrolls, plus 80 artifacts from the ancient community where they were discovered, will be displayed.

FOCUS | Cats see final 8 games as chance to turn season around

Bramlage Coliseum, where the Wildcats are 9-3 this season.

First on the docket is Colorado, a team K-State lost to by six points in Boulder, Colo., on Jan. 15.

Despite the loss, K-State won the respect of one man, CU Coach Ricardo Patton.

"What I have told our team is when you beat the likes of Kansas and Texas, you can expect everyone else's best shot," Patton said Monday. "There's no doubt in my mind that we will see the best Kansas State team we have seen all year.

"Watching our game with them here, they played us really well and had chances to win. It will be a very tough game for us."

At 4-4 in the conference, Colorado is also looking to make the necessary steps to secure a postseason-tournament bid. And like K-State, the Buffaloes haven't won a league game on the road this season.

"We understand you must take care of your home court," Patton said. "That's what the good teams do. The good teams don't lose at home."

K-State can't afford to lose at home.

At 2-6 in conference play, K-State would need to win four games, and one in the first round of the Big 12 tournament, to guarantee its first winning season since 1998-99.

An over-.500 record would also make the Wildcats more appealing to the postseason NIT tournament committee.

That's what the final eight games hold for the Wildcats – a chance to turn it all around.

"I feel we can win every game if we come out and play like we should play," guard Tim Ellis said. "Just limit teams to second chance points and rebounds, and I think we'll be all right."

Read it. Live it. Wear it.

HAYDEN | Freshman becomes more consistent in most recent games

Wow," Hayden said. "I appreciate winning more ever since I stepped on campus at K-State."

Since he took that first step on campus, Hayden has learned a lot.

He started the season huge, with a 20-point effort against BYU, but Hayden cooled down quickly and only scored 14 points during his next three games. He scored 14 versus Arkansas-Pine Bluff but only five at Wisconsin Green Bay.

He had 16 against Texas Tech but only two at Texas A&M.

But he has seemed to find some consistency in the last couple of games.

Hayden dropped in eight in an overtime loss to Oklahoma, 10 against Oklahoma State and 13 versus Kansas.

It has all been a part of his improvement process, Hayden said.

He said gaining confidence in his own abilities has proven the antidote to many of his early season lapses.

"As far as my overall game, I think I have come a really long ways," he said. "One of the main things is confidence. That is what Coach (Jim) Wooldridge has instilled in me. He told me 'You can make a million mistakes, but as long as you don't lose your work ethic I won't have a problem with it'. He told me that it made me feel a little bit more comfortable.

Statistically, Hayden has improved throughout the season. Now, the freshman who likes to win says he is focused on helping the Cats win enough games to qualify for the postseason.

He said it may be a tough job, but with the foundation that has already been lain and the help of resilient fans, it will get done.

"We still want to go to postseason play, and that is still very possible," Hayden said. "This team is good enough where we could turn this whole thing around. I came here to help turn this program around.

"I think the fans here feel it. They feel that we are there."

NASCAR | Racing plagues state with exhaust fumes and dirty mullets

"I can almost smell the transmission fluid."

Brilliant. If you were watching an actual sport, you wouldn't say that.

In fact, it never even crosses your mind. While watching a basketball game, I don't recall ever saying, "I can almost smell Michael Jordan's sweat." If I ever did, I would hope my friends would put me in the ICU.

After beginning in the south, a trend you can hear in most voices of these so-called athletes, NASCAR has spread like a bad disease. Even innocent little Kansas has been stricken by the exhaust fumes and the smell of dirty mullets.

The Kansas Speedway is entering its third year, and what a joy it is to know I am only 1 1/2 hours from a giant oval.

A trend in Kansas City, and yes I have seen it here on our campus, is adorning your car with your driver's number. This usually goes hand in hand with front license plates bearing that ridiculous confederate flag.

I am the biggest Michael Jordan fan out there, but I would never sport a giant 23 on my rear windshield. It just looks stupid.

So from here on out, if you're going to watch a "sport," watch something that takes an ounce of athletic ability. I hear ESPN usually shows a good bowling match on Sundays while NASCAR is airing.

Now that would make a good cereal.

KEMP | KBI identifies man wanted for questioning such as this because we've got to keep in mind that, if in fact this individual is eliminated, we must continue to strive forward."

Strader raised suspicions after a tip through the hotline and his past criminal record. However, Hill said, two or three leads have been at this level of suspicion and have been eliminated.

"He's just another person on the list," Hill said. "He is being sought by three or four other agencies for alleged crimes against women now. It just so happens with his past that he is now being looked at by other agencies. He closely resembles our illustration, and the fact he was in K.C. at that time – those are all similarities to the person. He is not a suspect in any shape or form."

Strader does fit the profile of what Hill said the department is looking for.

"Any individual would be the type of individual we would want to look at either to eliminate or confirm," he said. "He is apparently involved in the type of activity that our suspect was involved in."

The Leawood detectives will not spend time searching for Strader, leaving that up to the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, but will be compiling background checks and interviews to prepare for confronting him.

Hill said persons with any information in regard to this individual and his background, should call the hotline at 816-474-TIPS.

Kemp's sorority sisters at Pi Beta Phi are now having to relive their friend's loss all over again.

Marti Preib, sophomore in business and marketing, said the sorority members have gotten back t their normal lives, but this takes them back to the beginning.

Preib said her friends are not experiencing anger yet, but instead are focusing on waiting for the police to do their job.

"I think right now we are waiting because they don't know, and they haven't even caught him. Until we find out, it won't be a relief," she said.

CLEAN | Messy classrooms have potential for danger

said she has noticed some effects from the cuts.

"I have had some trouble with my own office," she said. "It sometimes piles up for a couple of days before someone takes it out – oftentimes me."

Harrington said she suggested to her students that they clean up their trash from the classrooms, and hasn't noticed a huge problem with litter. However technology classrooms, such as Umberger 105, provide a large problem for custodians, Bagby said.

Woods said it would take two custodians at least 40 minutes to clean Umberger 105, but food and drink spills on the carpet can extend that time.

George Clark, professor of geology, teaches classes in Umberger 105 and Thompson 101, both of which are technology classrooms. He said he usually doesn't notice if students bring food or drink into the classrooms, but prefers they not bring any liquids.

"That's where the real damage comes from," Clark said. "It stains the carpet and makes the room look really bad."

The variety of departments using large technology lecture halls takes away accountability, Woods said. If there is a spill in a large classroom, there is no telling if it occurred in the early morning, late afternoon or anywhere in between.

"We're not going to be the soda-pop police," Bagby said. "But I would think students and faculty want a clean environment."

Clark said he hasn't noticed the technology classrooms being too much of a mess, and said some students pick up used newspapers from the floor if there are none in the hallway racks.

"I don't want to feel like I'm running a police state in the classroom, telling students to pick up their newspapers," Clark said. "At the same time, I can sympathize with those that have to clean up afterwards."

Besides the aesthetics of a messy classroom, Bagby said the litter is potentially dangerous because someone could slip on a newspaper in an inclined classroom like Umberger 105. Also, eating and drinking could be distracting to the professor or other students.

But that's not all.

"It seems like the added costs of anything seems to be added costs to students," Bagby said. "Everything they can do to clean up is saving themselves money."

While students may want to protect their own pocket books, Woods said that cleaning up one's mess is just part of being in a community.

"We want to encourage everyone to pick up after themselves in the classrooms and on campus," he said.

"It's part of being a responsible citizen."

DROUGHT | Congress considers farm aid package

eligible for funding, around $250 million in savings could be used for assistance to livestock programs.

Kenneth Wood, farmer in Dickinson County, said he from what he's heard of the amendment, it sounds like a good idea.

"It's an effort to get the money where it's needed the most," he said.

"I think that's a pretty noble effort."

Forrest Buhler, staff attorney for the Kansas Agricultural Mediation Service, said the package would certainly help farmers.

"Anything's going to help right now," Buhler said. "A lot of farmers are facing difficult decisions – like how to make payments on debts they have."

Buhler said the package affects many farmers' abilities to receive loans or extensions on their loans.

"Farmers and their lenders have been waiting to see what assistance is appropriated by Congress," he said. "They can use that money to help get operating loans with their spring crops coming up."

Albright said if the farm package passes it will help cash flow needs during the spring when farmers are thinking about planting crops, but it's only a partial payment and won't make up for significant losses.

"The drought has put a hole in their (farmer's) gross income," Albright said. "They've seen their crop production eliminated and there's a cash flow crunch because of that."

Albright said the drought has also affected the local economy. He said as farmers become more financially stressed, they spend less money in town, which may in turn cause agricultural-based businesses to lay off workers.

Wood said besides the financial losses, farmers who have dealt with the drought for several years are having a hard time in other areas.

"Some of the guys in western Kansas who have gone through this from two to four years, have lost almost all of their crops and have had to sell off livestock. That's emotionally and mentally difficult to deal with."

Although Albright said he doesn't think the drought has caused many farmers to give up on their farms, they may be turning some of their attention to other areas.

"We're always losing farmers," he said.

"At the very least, its caused people to look off the farm to make up extra money."

ELECTIONS | Committee expects smooth process

vendors, he said, was that they had a general system that works for most universities, instead of customized programs.

"This year we've been able to have a system that is specifically designed for our use," he said. "It should be easier and provide more security and stability."

Gould said the only problem she foresees is if students haven't changed their passwords.

Students will use their eIDs and passwords to vote on the SGA elections Web site.

Gould said that while it will be possible for those who haven't changed their passwords by the Feb. 12 deadline to vote, it will make the process more difficult.

"We don't want to leave anyone out, so those people can visit the Info Help Desk," she said.

"But it would help us out if students get this done on time."

Not only is the online balloting system expected to be more efficient this year, it will also cost SGA less money.

Harlan said each outside vendor charged a different price, so pinpointing actual savings was difficult. Overall, SGA will spend less with the in-house system.

"We are expecting it to be a smooth process," he said. "Some changes have been made and for the most part the ballots are ready now."

Utah police arrest wanted man

Man wanted for questioning in Kemp murder case arrested after traffic stop

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLATHE, Kan. – A man charged with rapes in both Kansas and Missouri and wanted for questioning about the killing of a young woman from suburban Kansas City last summer has been arrested in Utah.

Lt. Charles Black of the Johnson County sheriff's department said his office got word late Monday night that James C. Strader, 27, was in the custody of police in Richfield, Utah, a community along Interstate 70.

Black said he was told Strader was stopped after driving off without paying for gas.

Black said that when the officer checked he discovered Johnson County had issued a warrant charging Strader with rape and aggravated kidnapping.

James Craig Strader
WANTED FOR QUESTIONING

Meanwhile, police in Leawood, Kan., have been wanting to talk to Strader about the fatal beating last June of Ali Kemp, 19, who was a student at K-State. She was attacked in the pump room at a neighborhood swimming pool where she worked.

The homicide has been widely publicized, with an artist's depiction of a man reported to have been seen near the pool time to time since the killing.

"The fact that he (Strader) resembles our artistic representation, plus the fact that he was in our community around June of 2002, that moved him to the top" among people investigators want to talk to, said Leawood Police Major Craig Hill. "Not that he's a suspect."

The Johnson County warrant, filed last Friday, involved an attack on a Gardner woman who said she was a former girlfriend of Strader. And authorities in Benton County, Mo., have charged Strader with raping a 14-year-old girl on the same day.

The former girlfriend said Strader came to her home, raped her at knifepoint and forced her to ride with him to an area near the Lake of the Ozarks.

She said Strader drove to an abandoned mobile home and was trying to break in when the 14-year-old girl walked past.

According to court documents, the girl said she was grabbed by a man with a knife in his hand, who threw her into the back seat of a car.

In addition to rape, he is charged in Missouri with armed criminal action, kidnapping and burglary. Bond there is set at $250,000, while the Kansas bond for him is $50,000.

Strader has also been described as a suspect in the kidnapping of a woman from Hutchinson, Kan., last Friday.

That woman said she was sexually assaulted by a man who came to her door, saying he had car trouble and asking to use the phone.

Tape advises Iraqis

Voice suggesting attacks could be bin Laden's

By Nadia Abou El-Magd
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates – An audiotape purported to carry the voice of Osama bin Laden called on Iraqis to carry out suicide attacks against Americans and defend themselves against a U.S. attack.

Osama bin Laden

The tape was broadcast on the al-Jazeera Arab satellite station on Tuesday, the first day of the Muslim holiday Eid al-Adha. The speaker also urged Iraqis to dig trenches and engage in urban warfare to fend off U.S. troops and called on Muslims to rise up against several U.S.-allied governments in the region.

"We stress the importance of martyrdom operations against the enemy, these attacks that have scared Americans and Israelis like never before," the speaker said, using a term often used by militants for suicide attacks.

U.S. counterterrorism officials in Washington said the audio message was probably a real recording of bin Laden, and that a technical analysis was planned to authenticate it. The officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said it was unclear when the recording was made but said it was probably recent, given all the attention the speaker gave to Iraq.

In an interview with al-Jazeera aired after the tape, U.S. State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said the recording shows that Iraq and al-Qaeda "are bound by a common hatred."

"He threatens everybody in the Arab world except Saddam Hussein," Boucher said. "We are saying Iraq is giving a haven to this group."

It was not clear if any Iraqis heard Tuesday's broadcast. Satellite dishes are banned in the country, limiting access to al-Jazeera, and it was not immediately known if Iraqi stations or international radio stations that can be heard in Iraq aired the statement.

Before the broadcast, Secretary of State Colin Powell told a Senate panel Tuesday that he had read a transcript of the statement and that it shows why the world needs to be

Fashion factors into shoe choice

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Look at your feet.

How do you decide what goes there? Is comfort or style more important? Technology, or a celebrity endorsement? What if the shoe feels great but the colors are all wrong?

These are the questions companies are trying to answer when making shoes for an often-fickle American consumer. Clint Hutchens, assistant manager at Ballard's Sporting Goods, said sales representatives often consult him on what consumers are buying.

And while Nike is still king of the hill, Hutchens said consumers are looking at other brands.

"Fashion sense has always been there, but fashion has moved away from the best $150 basketball shoes," he said. "Fashion is in the looks."

Instead, fashion seems to be moving toward specifically targeted shoes that, among other things, are often cheaper. The National Sporting Goods Association recently reported that the average shoe price for 2002 was $38.88, down 3 percent from the 2001 average price of $40.17.

How are shoes getting less expensive? Nike, for one, posted big numbers with its Air Force Ones, a shoe that was designed in the 1980s, and required no work in development or marketing. It is one of the many retro shoes that have become more popular.

While retro shoes may satisfy consumer tastes for fashion, those consumers won't pay top-dollar for them like they would a celebrity-endorsed basketball shoe,

Black people are Americans even though they have paid a terrible price for it, said the first female NAACP president to her audience Tuesday night. Myrlie Evers-Williams spoke as part of Black History Month at Forum Hall.

Evers-Williams was the wife of Medgar Evers, a civil rights leader who was murdered in 1963. His murderer was not convicted until 1994.

"My forefathers gave up so much to become a real part of America," Evers-Williams said. "I am an American, and I will not let anyone take that away from me."

She said she was born "colored" and didn't particularly like it.

"Lo and behold, I saw where I could be involved. I became an educator helping people say 'Negro,'" Evers-Williams said. "We may be black, but that's OK. Black is beautiful, and black is strong."

Evers-Williams said she used to think she got to where she is now all on her own.

BANTER AND BELLOW

Lone bellower embarks on journalistic journey in lieu of student body elections

Dana:

You may want to keep running and running, but at some point in life, you're gonna hit some barriers.

My most recent one has come – in the form of student government elections.

I know you're going to be disappointed, but the banter known as Layton Ehmke's side of this column is temporarily out of service. Think of Mr. Ehmke as out of town – riding the election train.

It's a dark day in columndom.

He and I were planning to discuss the ideal Valentine's Day date. Perhaps I should shove my holiday cheer into a heart-shaped box of assorted chocolates – after I make someone eat those damn marshmallowy squares of sickening goo.

A redhead without a partner is a scary thing. I am therefore announcing my plan to become what could only be described as a Page 2 Playa.

Yes, my friends, I plan to write around.

And why not? I hear college is a time of exploration. My journalistic, word-loving self can find all sorts of writers to get down and dirty with.

There are poetic men with drippingly sweet words and freshly woven phrases. Then there's the simple guy – he has nothing to hide. Or perhaps I would do better with a gritty writer who likes harsh, earthy words that leave readers breathless.

Or not. The best partner is someone who just makes people laugh. A lot.

It's official: in the next few weeks, I hope to explore my writeuality.

Today is the first day of the rest of my writing life.

Who knows what will happen next Wednesday?

Question:

Where's Layton?

Banterer Layton Ehmke is on hiatus to pursue political office. You can e-mail Banter and Bellow columnist Dana Strongin, junior in print journalism, at banter@spub.ksu.edu.

3rd pair announces candidacy

Hoopingarner, Ehmke focus on textbooks, scholarships

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN
Layton Ehmke and Eric Hoopingarner are running for student body vice president and president in the upcoming SGA election. Their ticket promotes an online book exchange as well as more scholarship money for female athletes and bringing more rock concerts to campus.

Eric Hoopingarner and Layton Ehmke have become the third set of candidates to enter student government's presidential race.

Hoopingarner, junior in economics and social sciences, and Ehmke, senior in print journalism, said there are several reasons for their decision to run for office.

Three of their campaign issues are to include an online book-exchange program, more scholarships for female athletes and Manhattan's lack of rock concerts.

"We're not happy about only having one option to buy books," Ehmke said.

A solution to the problem would be to implement an online book exchange, an idea Hoopingarner said came from the University of Oklahoma.

He said the program would involve students going to a Web link on K-State Online to enter the book title that they want to buy.

In addition, the program would give students a chance to sell their books back online.

"The program would give students a chance to barter," he said. "They would enter the price they wish to pay for a book and see if there are any takers."

The fact that K-State does not offer women's soccer or softball teams is another issue the pair hopes to address. Hoopingarner said they would try to find a way to increase women's scholarships in order to keep K-State compliant with Title IX.

"With the new soccer facility we have, it is the perfect opportunity for women's soccer," Ehmke said.

Hoopingarner and Ehmke also plan to bring one or two large concerts to Manhattan. Hoopingarner said they would aim to get major rock or hip-hop groups in addition to the annual Country Stampede.

"K-State deserves to have access to a major concert the way many other universities do," Ehmke said.

He said they would try to get bands that would please the college audience.

Another plan the pair is proposing is to have the next K-State versus University of Kansas basketball game be played in Ahearn Field House.

The stadium would provide a great atmosphere for the game, Hoopingarner said.

"Forget the lavender uniforms, this is what we need for nostalgia," Ehmke said.

Hoopingarner said they would like to be a springboard for students to present ideas. He said that student government has the power and money; all they need is to know what students want.

"We're not doing this as a resumé builder," Ehmke said.

Hoopingarner agreed.

"All of these ideas are accomplishable and will benefit all students," he said.

NATO expresses further resistance for war with Iraq

By Paul Ames
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium – Washington's effort to build a coalition for war against Iraq hit more resistance Tuesday from NATO and beyond, with allies balking and China adding its voice to calls for bolstered U.N. arms inspections.

A second day of heated negotiations failed to end one of the worst crises in NATO's 53-year history: a split triggered when France, Germany and Belgium blocked U.S. plans to defend Turkey in a possible new Persian Gulf war.

After behind-the-scene talks throughout the day, ambassadors from the 19 NATO countries met for only 20 minutes Tuesday evening before ending the session. Talks were to resume Wednesday morning. The 15 other alliance members support the United States.

"Right now we do not have a conclusion," NATO spokesman Yves Brodeur told reporters. "It is a serious issue and everyone is committed to work hard to try to find a solution to it."

"There are a number of options that have been discussed," Brodeur said without elaborating. "Consultations between capitals" will continue through the night "to try and find common ground," he said.

The division in the alliance also threatens to undermine the Bush administration's attempts to muster support in the U.N. Security Council for military action against Iraq. France, Russia and Germany sought more time Monday for beefed-up U.N. inspections in a proposal opposed by Washington.

Chinese President Jiang Zemin, in a telephone call with French President Jacques Chirac, reiterated China's stance on finding a peaceful solution to the Iraq crisis.

Beijing's support means three permanent members of the council – with veto power – are now lined up against the United States and Britain in opposition to war with Saddam.

"The inspection in Iraq is effective and should be continued and strengthened," China's official Xinhua news agency paraphrased Jiang as saying Tuesday. "Warfare is good for no one, and it is our responsibility to take various measures to avoid war."

Besides China, France and Russia also were prepared to block a Security Council resolution calling for war, after Moscow added its voice Monday in support of intensified arms inspections.

In Paris, Prime Minister Jean-Pierre Raffarin praised the French-Russian partnership against an Iraq war Tuesday. "It is up to us ... to do everything possible to prevent a conflict that could seriously threaten regional and international stability," he said in a toast to visiting Russian President Vladimir Putin.

NATO's disarray drew international headlines, with Danish newspapers proclaiming "NATO in a historic crisis" and "NATO is the hostage of the Iraq conflict."

The crisis cast doubt on the future of an alliance founded to fight the Cold War: In seeking to reinvent itself as a force to counter terrorism or rogue states, the alliance has yet to agree on even modest defensive measures for one of its members.

TO THE POINT

Cellular-phone owners should monitor use

First it was the pager. Now we have the cell phone.

This need-to-have gadget many of us can't live without is convenient, but it can become a burden to some professors and students.

Hearing a cell phone go off in class is not an uncommon occurrence anymore. This has raised the question of what cell phone etiquette should be.

Though it may be impossible to find a feasible solution to regulating cell-phone use in public places, it should be common courtesy to turn cell phones off while in class.

It a simple issue of respect – respect for peers and respect for professors. A ringing cell phone, especially when someone answers it in class, is a great distraction to the learning environment as well as disrespectful.

It's only for a matter of hours each day. Turn it off, and be sure to follow some simple respectful cell-phone etiquette while in class. Other students and professors will be glad you did.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

CHRISTIANITY'S BAD RAP

Christianity is misunderstood in an all-accepting culture

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

We are known as Bible-thumpers, hypocrites and narrow-minded stewards of a greedy faith.

It's not hip to be a Christian.

With outspoken conservative Christian speakers like Rush Limbaugh blowing up the airwaves, the public's perception of a Christian is a self-righteous hypocrite with outrageous opinions and no facts. We are seen as judgmental because we refuse to accept what we believe is sin – and misconceptions of the modern day Christian abound mired in ignorance and parochialism.

The view of Christians as uneducated and close-minded is the politically correct highway that many so-called "intellectuals" are taking. When people are willing to stand up and say they believe abortion is wrong on moral grounds because they firmly believe it is murder, opposing parties recoil in horror.

Standing by your beliefs and holding on to your morals does not uphold America's acceptance-of-everyone doctrine.

Christianity is grossly misunderstood. When a scumbag blows up an abortion clinic in the name of God, Christians are stereotyped as fanatic morons who will do anything to force their beliefs and faith upon others. These imbeciles do not represent the Christian faith – they are radicals who have aided in creating a stereotype of ignorance.

Believing something is morally wrong because the Bible says it is does not mean you are casting judgment or directing hatred toward particular groups.

The current fad is to point out hypocrites using God as an excuse to gain wealth or administer power over people.

As with any faith or belief, someone is going to abuse it. However, when the collection plate is passed around in my church, I know the money is aiding missionaries, the poor and people within my church in need of financial aid.

There are ministers like Jesse Jackson who don't have churches but are lining their pockets with cash.

However, greed and the pursuit of money are contradictory to everything the Christian religion is based on.

People should understand tru Christian doctrine before adamantly criticizing it.

If you don't believe that there is a God in heaven who sent his son as the redeemer of your sins, you will not understand the faith and beliefs of a Christian.

However, understanding people and their beliefs is just as important as working to comprehend other cultures.

You can listen to and understand other human beings without agreeing to or accepting their beliefs.

Before we attack Christians and what they stand for, let us step back and take a look at what some religious organizations and leaders have done.

Martin Luther King Jr. was a Christian minister, and he radically changed this country through the peaceful claiming of equal rights for African-Americans.

The Collegian's front page story titled, "For The Smiles," on Monday was the story of the First Congregational Church United Church of Christ feeding the homeless and other needy families.

Christians are not elitist monsters who believe in taking baseball bats and bombs to those who disagree with us.

Do we claim to know the truth? Absolutely. Will we share it with others? Yes. There is nothing wrong with standing by your beliefs.

Valentine's Day is for everyone, not just couples

MICAH HAWKINSON

The festival of St. Valentine is undoubtedly the best day of the year. No, really. Just look at all the benefits it provides.

Valentine's Day is one of the only holidays that truly offers something for everyone. This is especially true for romantically entangled people. For them, it serves as an outlet for the ushy-gushy love that wells up so plentifully in their hearts.

Cupid-stricken mortals seem to enjoy nothing more than the opportunity to fling handfuls of chocolate and thorned flowers at the objects of their affection. And why shouldn't they? Isn't that what true love is about, after all?

Valentine's Day is a golden opportunity for lovers to display their intense – indeed, often disconcertingly so – devotion to their loved ones.

And, although they are often overlooked in the mid-February bustle of lovin', swinging singles have a lot to gain from the holiday, too. The biggest plus for them is fattening, delicious and rhymes with "schmocolate."

In the festival of giving, generous lovers and loved ones rarely overlook their benighted, less fortunate brothers and sisters who lack romantic relationships. There's always plenty of confectionery goodness to go around.

But even if the lone wolves among us don't get their fill of candy on the Valentine's Day, they can always count on being able to pick up cheap sweets on the morning after.

One of the wonderful things about our capitalist system is how increased supply and decreased demand drive the market price down and fill my rotund belly with smooth, delectable and cheap milk chocolate. It's a beautiful thing, my friends.

The other significant benefit for loners is the ease of detecting other singles on Valentine's Day.

Women don't have to search any farther than the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex on the evening of the 14th to find any number of available men.

They should pay extra attention to the free-weights section, where numerous men will no doubt be trying to put some meat on their scrawny frames in order to attract women.

Likewise, men can peruse the romantic comedy section of any video store and find a large quantity of single women. (Hint: look especially for the ones with tubs of ice cream under their arms.)

Although it is beneficial for all, the day of candy hearts and romance can have its downsides.

Even lovebirds can get tired of singing to one another, and humans generally don't have as much sense as their aviary cousins. Eventually, the wonder of the day wears off, and the romantic duo is left with an odd feeling of displacement and a spoiled appetite from all those darned candy hearts.

Many of us have a good idea of what disadvantages Valentine's Day has for singles. The loneliness they feel throughout the year gets intensified sevenfold as they see their friends, co-workers and acquaintances demonstrating their affection for one another.

This can cause discomfort and emotional distress, to say the least. Sometimes, a few impolite singles go so far as to express uncharitable wishes about the phrase 'Til death do us part" and its ideal applicability to all romantically involved persons.

Nonetheless, Valentine's Day should be a time of pleasure and enjoyment for all reasonable people.

Especially the ones whose only plans for the day are to finish next week's opinion column early and then watch Lifetime movies until they cry themselves to sleep.

U.S. bombs missile launcher in southern Iraq in 1st operation

By Matt Kelley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – U.S. planes bombed a ballistic missile launcher in southern Iraq on Tuesday, Pentagon officials said, in the first operation against Iraqi weapons that are meant to hit ground targets instead of aircraft or ships.

Eight American warplanes dropped a total of 16 bombs on the Iraqi missile system near Basra at about 11 a.m. EST, Pentagon officials said, speaking on condition of anonymity. A statement from U.S. Central Command said the Iraqis had moved the mobile missile-launching system into the southern no-fly zone.

"Saddam Hussein put these systems in range of our troops and the people of Kuwait, and under U.N. authority, we struck them," said Jim Wilkinson, a Central Command spokesman.

The U.S. bombs struck an Iraqi Ababil-100 missile launcher, a command van and resupply vehicles, senior officials said.

The Ababil is a solid-fueled missile developed after the 1991 Gulf War. Iraq says it does not fly farther than the 93-mile limit on Iraqi missiles imposed by United Nations sanctions. The United States and Britain say the Ababil probably either has a longer range or could easily be modified to fly farther. U.S. officials say the Ababil also can be used to carry chemical or biological warheads.

Even under the U.N. limit, an Ababil missile fired from Basra could easily reach Kuwait, where thousands of U.S. troops are massing in preparation for a possible invasion of Iraq.

U.S. warplanes also attacked a mobile surface-to-air missile system near Basra on Monday. Iraq claimed that strike killed two civilians.

American military officials say they go to great lengths to avoid hitting civilians and say Iraq often lies about civilian casualties.

Tuesday was the 15th day this year that U.S. or coalition forces have struck at targets inside Iraq's two no-fly zones. The airstrikes are meant to retaliate against Iraqi attempts to shoot down coalition warplanes and to soften up Iraqi defenses before a possible invasion.

Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, is about 245 miles southeast of Baghdad in the southern no-fly zone set up by the United States to protect Iraq's Shiite Muslims.

CIA director predicts attacks in U.S., Arabian peninsula

By John J. Lumpkin
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Intelligence information suggests al-Qaeda attacks may occur as early as this week in both the United States and on the Arabian peninsula, CIA Director George J. Tenet told Congress on Tuesday.

The information led to last week's raising of the national terror alert level to "orange," the second highest level of five. The information came from "multiple sources with strong al-Qaeda ties," Tenet said without providing details.

"The intelligence is not idle chatter on the part of terrorists and their associates," Tenet said. "It is the most specific we have seen, and it is consistent with both our knowledge of al-Qaeda's doctrine and our knowledge of plots this network – and particularly its senior leadership – has been working on for years."

The information pointing to imminent attacks was gathered both in the United States and overseas, said FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III, who joined Tenet and other intelligence chiefs to brief the Senate Intelligence Committee in an annual public session on threats to national security.

The CIA director said the information suggests the attack may involve a "dirty bomb" – a weapon that spreads radioactive material over a wide area – or chemical or poison weapons.

Officials last week worried the attack was timed to coincide with the hajj, a Muslim holy period this week.

But Mueller and Tenet said the U.S. government has no specific information pointing conclusively to where, when, or how terrorists would strike.

They said raising the national alert level – and taking security measures at government and business centers – makes it more difficult for the terrorists to carry out an attack.

Tenet had little information Tuesday morning on a new audio message attributed to Osama bin Laden, which aired later in the day.

Some previous recordings of the al-Qaeda chief have served as a prelude to terrorist attacks.

The CIA chief also repeated many of Secretary of State Colin Powell's statements last week to the United Nations regarding Iraq's efforts to acquire chemical, biological and nuclear weapons, and linking al-Qaeda supporters to the Iraqi government. Tenet said the key link between Baghdad and al-Qaeda is Abu Musab Zarqawi, a senior associate of bin Laden.

About two dozen of Zarqawi's followers remain in Baghdad, where Zarqawi spent two months last summer. All are members of Egyptian Islamic Jihad, a terrorist group that has merged with al-Qaeda, Tenet said.

But he said he has no evidence suggesting Iraq has any operational control over Zarqawi's group or al-Qaeda.

Echoing Bush administration policy-makers, Tenet and the other intelligence chiefs offered little hope that U.N. inspections would prompt Iraq to disarm, saying Saddam is intent upon and capable of circumventing the inspections.

Tenet also said U.S. intelligence has given U.N. inspectors all of its information on what it believed were Iraqi weapons sites.

Greenspan: new tax cuts may not be necessary

By Jeannine Aversa
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan said Tuesday that he wasn't totally convinced that a new round of tax cuts is necessary to bolster the economy and said Congress must make sure future budget deficits remain under control.

Greenspan's comments dealt a blow to President Bush's drive to enact a new round of $1.3 trillion in tax cuts, which Democrats have complained will lead to exploding budget deficits in future years.

In his appearance before the Senate Banking Committee, the Fed chairman urged Congress to renew budgetary rules that would place caps on spending increases and require that any future tax cuts not result in runaway budget deficits.

Greenspan said all of these restraints are critical in light of the fact that the Baby Boom generation will begin retiring early in the next decade, putting huge demands on Social Security and Medicare.

At the White House, presidential spokesman Ari Fleischer said that Bush remained committed to his economic program and believes "he will get much if not all of what he has asked for." In an effort to build support,

Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney were scheduled to meet later in the day with several Republicans, including Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, who has expressed reservations about the dividend portion of the plan.

House Majority Leader Tom Delay, R-Texas, said the Republican-controlled Congress hoped to have the legislation on Bush's desk by Memorial Day but he acknowledged that some Republicans had concerns about Bush's package.

Greenspan's comments on Tuesday were in sharp contrast to the support he provided two years ago when he came out in support of Bush's first large tax cut, a $1.35 trillion, 10-year reduction in taxes that was passed during the 2001 year.

Greenspan said the projected surpluses of $5.6 trillion over a decade made such a tax cut advisable, critical support that Republicans often cited in winning approval of the 2001 tax cut.

Greenspan did say Tuesday that he supports Bush's proposal to eliminate the double-taxation of investment dividends as a reform of the tax system that would boost business investment. But he agreed with suggestions made by Democrats that the measure should be made revenue neutral, possibly by eliminating corporate tax subsidies to pay the $385 billion cost over 10 years for eliminating taxes on investor dividends.

Greenspan said that currently he does not think the economy needs further economic stimulus and said Congress should spend more time focusing on actions that would bolster long-term growth.

PGA invite positive

Invitation shows progress

SEAN PURCELL

You gotta love professional golf.

I know I do.

On Monday, The Associated Press quoted an anonymous source from Bank of America, the sponsor of this year's Colonial golf tournament, saying it plans to offer an invitation to Annika Sorenstam, the LPGA's top player, to play in the PGA tour event.

That's pretty big news.

Especially with the controversy about how Augusta still doesn't extend memberships to women.

Sorenstam playing from the men's tees isn't what the sport needs, but it just shows that golf has the best story lines. It's pretty much the equivalent of when the tennis circuit had Billie Jean King play Bobby Riggs in a Battle of the Sexes match. Only this time, the woman won't prevail – and that's OK.

But it will be another test to see how women stack up against men in an individual sport. If you ask me, Sorenstam will hold her own.

Sure, she won't beat the likes of Tiger Woods or Phil Mickelson, or whoever the big names at the tournament will be, but I would take her straight-up over John Daly, whose only highlights on Sportscenter in the past few years are of him hitting a 400-yard tee shot into the water, or disqualifying himself because

Men's golf jumps 3 spots on final day

A common theme during the fall portion of the men's golf season resurfaced this week at the Rice Intercollegiate in Cypress, Texas.

First-round struggles have plagued the team at nearly every tournament this season, and it was much the same for Coach Tim Norris' team during the first tournament of the spring.

"For this particular course, No. 1, it's early in the year and we haven't been outside much," Norris said. "And No. 2, this is a brand-new golf course that we've never seen before. I think a lot of our guys are patient and they know it's a 54-hole event. If we can hang close to that lead after the first round, I know they'll close the deal."

After struggling during the first two rounds on Monday, Junior Aaron Watkins came back in Tuesday's final round and shot a 1-over-par 73 to move into a tie for 22nd place overall. He finished with a 10-over 226.

"That was a 76 that he turned into a 73 because of the shotgun start. He finished on what I think are two of the toughest holes on the golf course and birdied them both," Norris said. "He missed a pretty makeable birdie putt on the K-State forward Marques Hayden fights for one of his six rebounds in K-State's victory over Colorado Tuesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

It may have been ugly, but K-State is finally back on the horse.

Out-rebounded, out-blocked and nearly out-shot, the Wildcats (12-10, 3-6) still managed to get past Colorado (14-8, 4-5) 62-54 on Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

Lucky for K-State, though, its defense showed up

"I just thought we played outstanding on defense tonight," Coach Jim Wooldridge said. "We were able to get them in the half court for the most part and I just have to compliment our guys. They played with a lot of grit, a lot of confidence against a very good basketball team."

K-State led by as many as 13 points early in the second half, but Colorado strung a 19-4 run together to lead by four with 7:32 to go.

The comfort the Wildcats had enjoyed was suddenly gone.

Guard Gilson DeJesus said it was eerily reminiscent of the run then-No. 12/11 Kansas put on the Wildcats late in Saturday's loss.

"We needed something to get us going," DeJesus said. "We were at a bad time right there. It reminded me of the Kansas game, so I was like, 'It's not going to happen again.' They found me free to shoot, and I made it."

DeJesus' 3-pointer, his second of the game, tied the contest at 49.

The senior later would hit an-

Gilson DeJesus entered Tuesday night's game as the No. 11 3-point shooter in the nation.

In fact, because of DeJesus' potency from long range, the Cats were the best 3-point-shooting team in the Big 12.

But neither DeJesus nor any of the other Cats could find the hot hand once the game got started.

DeJesus, averaging three treys a game, missed on his first five tries.

He said he kept his composure though, while connecting on his final two 3-balls to cement K-State's third Big 12 win.

"It's hard," he said. "If you didn't shoot well for the entire game, you just need to keep your confidence. I just kept confident that sometime in the game it had to come up. And it did at the end."

Jarrett Hart, who scored the team's only 3-pointer of the first half, said that when a shooter hits a dry spell, he can't lose his confidence.

"I always encourage them to keep shooting," he said. "You aren't going to hit every shot, just like a ref isn't going to make every call."

Going into halftime, the Cats were just 1-of-10 from beyond the arc. But Coach Jim Wooldridge knew his team would have to find some outside success if it hoped to hang on to its 23-18 halftime lead.

He attributed his shooters' poor starts to their stellar

High school | Coach earns record win

Fort Worth Dunbar coach Robert Hughes became the winningest high school coach in the country with his 1,275th win Tuesday night.

Dunbar (30-1) beat Fort Worth Polytechnic 71-62 in its regular season finale, pushing Hughes out of a tie with Morgan Wootten as the winningest coach. The next game for Dunbar, the top-ranked Class 4A team in Texas, will be in the playoffs.

The 74-year-old Hughes, in his 45th year of coaching, has a record of 1,275-248 (.837). He tied Wootten with an 81-39 win over Fort Worth North Side on Friday night.

High School | James' ref investigated

The postgame encounter was brief, just long enough for LeBron James to put his arm around a referee, lean in and smile for the camera.

Now, however, that seemingly innocent moment could hurt referee Tony Celantano, who faces possible sanctions for his actions following James' impressive comeback game on Saturday night.

The president of the central New Jersey chapter of the International Association of Approved Basketball Officials said the group is investigating whether Celantano broke any rules by posing with the 18-year-old high school basketball star.

NHL | Weight will miss at least 1 game

Doug Weight, the St. Louis Blues' top playmaker, is expected to miss at least one game after being struck in the face by a puck against the Sabres on Tuesday night.

Weight required stitches to close a cut above his upper lip and also appeared woozy as he was helped off the ice with 8:12 left in the second period. He did not return to the game won by the Blues 3-2.

St. Louis coach Joel Quenneville considered it questionable whether Weight will be able to play when the Blues face Philadelphia at home on Thursday.

PGA | Sorenstam mulling Colonial showing

A tournament made famous by Ben Hogan and steeped in tradition on the PGA Tour could be in for a real twist: Annika Sorenstam is negotiating to play in the Colonial.

Tournament director Dee Finely said Tuesday her agent has inquired about giving one of the 12 sponsor's exemptions to Sorenstam. That would make her the first woman to play on the PGA Tour since 1945 — the year before Colonial began.

Students given opportunity to drive NASCAR simulators in Student Union

Event helps raise awareness about other UPC activities

Students were given the opportunity to drive NASCAR virtual reality cars for free in the K-State Student Union on Tuesday.

"I was studying upstairs, and I saw the cars. I thought it would be fun, so I came and tried it," Brian Blackwell, sophomore in business, said.

The cars, provided by Kramer Entertainment Inc., of Michigan, are connected to a computer, where they race against each other and the computer.

Sponsored by the Union Program Council as part of UPC Awareness Week, many interested students visited the cars for various reasons.

"I saw the cars, and I wanted to do it," Jacquee Jones, senior in math education, said.

"It looked like fun."

Jones said she really likes what UPC does for students.

"We need to relax between classes, especially with all the tests everyone has coming up," she said.

"It's good for them to do things like this so we can take a break."

Jones also said she takes advantage of other opportunities UPC provides for students.

"My friends and I go to After Hours on Friday nights a lot," she said.

Blackwell said he also is pleased with what UPC has to offer students.

"They have a lot of really good programs," Blackwell said.

Adam Boutz, freshman in general engineering, agreed.

"I think the programs are great. I see them a lot as I come through the Union," Boutz said.

UPC thought the students would enjoy the car racing, said Matt Pruett, senior in graphic design and president of UPC.

"We've never done it before," he said. "It was reviewed really well, and people at other schools were really excited about it."

The purpose of UPC Awareness Week is to make UPC's presence known to students, Pruett said.

"We provide programs to be both entertaining and educational, like films, lectures, speakers and special events," he said.

"We hope to keep the program going, and work to make the campus experience better."

BIN LADEN | Washington: Iraq associated with al-Qaeda network

concerned about Iraqi ties to terrorism.

Powell said that on the tape, "bin Laden – or who we believe to be bin Laden ... once again speaks to the people of Iraq and talks about their struggle and how he is in partnership with Iraq."

Washington insists that Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein is linked to bin Laden's al-Qaeda terror network and cites that as one reason to launch military action against Iraq.

The speaker on the tape said nothing about direct ties between al-Qaeda and the Iraqi government – saying his followers only share a common interest with Iraq, even though he denounced Saddam's secular, socialist al-Baath party as "infidels."

"It does not harm in these circumstances that the interests of Muslims and socialists crisscross in fighting against the Crusaders," he said.

bin Laden urged Iraqis to fight the Americans whether or not Saddam remains in power.

Yasser Thabet, a broadcast editor at al-Jazeera, said the 16-minute tape appears to be authentic because the television station got it through the same means as previous bin Laden statements.

"When you listen to the tape, you can tell it's Osama bin Laden's voice," Thabet said.

The last tape from bin Laden, the mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, aired on Nov. 12 on al-Jazeera. Bin Laden, in the statement, promised new terrorist attacks.

In Tuesday's tape, the speaker urged the Iraqis to stay strong against a U.S. attack and blunt the force of a U.S. aerial assault by "digging large numbers of trenches and camouflaging them."

He described al-Qaeda fighters in Afghanistan withstanding heavy U.S. bombardment by hiding in trenches.

"With all the might of the enemy, they were unable to defeat us and take over that position."

"We advise about the importance of drawing the enemy in to long, close and tiring fighting, taking advantage of camouflaged positions in plains, farms, mountains and cities," he said.

He said the enemy is terrified about urban warfare "because they will have big casualties."He also called on true Muslims to rise up "incite and mobilize the Islamic nation ... to break free from the slavery of these regimes who are slaves of America."

The speaker urged Muslims not to cooperate with the United States against Iraq, criticizing Arab governments who support Washington in its efforts to rid Iraq of its alleged weapons of mass destruction.

"Anyone who helps America – from the Iraqi hypocrites (opposition) or Arab rulers ... whoever fights with them of offers them bases or administrative assistance, or any kind of support of help, even if only with words, to kill Muslims in Iraq – should know that he is an apostate."

SHOES | Shoe consumers seek comfort rather than technology

Hutchens said.

"When the economy was doing better, people were going for the Air Jordans and whatnot," he said.

"It's taken a downturn again, and that's when trends started going back to the retro stuff."

Another idea is that retro simply looks good.

"The Air Force Ones are nice," said Natalie Rolfe, junior in television and radio and American ethnic studies.

Edging in on Nike in retro fashion are Adidas and Puma, while Converse consistently moves its classic Chuck Taylor model. Hutchens himself dons a low-top brown suede retro Puma model.

"I love the retro stuff," he said. "I talked them into carrying the Puma stuff at Ballard's."

What about people who care about performance?

Kajsa Affolter, freshman in biology and Spanish, said she works out five times a week, but she isn't faithful to any specific brand of shoes.

Wearing a New Balance model, a competitor with Nike in the running shoe market, Affolter said she tries on shoes with utility as the main priority.

"I look for comfort and a good fit in general," she said. "I like certain brands for certain things, like K-Swiss for tennis, but I'm not that faithful to a brand."

Nike is known for its technology, such as the new Shox system, but that technology doesn't matter to most people who are just looking for shoes to wear around, Hutchens said.

While there still is a market for Nike's technology in hardcore runners and other athletes, Hutchens said it is no longer the fashion shoe.

Alex Pettigrew, freshman in public relations, said she didn't consider technology when choosing her Nikes, especially since she doesn't just wear them for working out.

"I liked these because of the color," she said of her pink and white running shoes.

"They're cute, and they go with a lot of my clothes."

On the other hand, Darren Jamison, junior in secondary education, said he owns eight pairs of shoes, and possibly the most comfortable are a pair of Nikes that employ the Shox technology.

"They feel so good. It feels like you're just wearing socks," he said.

While people are divided on what to look for in the right shoe, it seems clear that high-dollar sneakers aren't selling like they used to, and fashion is a bigger concern for students than performance.

Above all, Hutchens said, people shouldn't think too much about it.

"If you look down at your feet that much, you probably have some self-esteem problems," he said.

shoulders and sacrifices of so many other people," she said.

She said she is thankful for having lived during the time that she is seeing so much progress for black people.

"Of course I've seen change. All of us have. Look around us today and see what's happening."

Evers-Williams spoke of the events of Sept. 11, saying she is fearful that in the United States, people are being lost.

"Our domestic issues are being hidden," she said.

She said race relations shouldn't be pushed to the back because of international issues.

"Find some way to address it and get involved," Evers-Williams said. "We are only as strong abroad as we are within our nation."

Essence Halliburton, multicultural committee co-chair for the Union Program Council, said she was impressed by Evers-Williams' discussion of Sept. 11.

"She reiterated that we're all human, and we need to work together for the good of all of us," Halliburton said.

"She reiterated that we all have the same blood. We don't know what DNA runs through us."

Evers-Williams said it is vital for black people to know their history.

"It is important that we delve deep into it and use the past as a kind of momentum to move us into the future."

There once was a time in the past when she was filled with hatred, she said, but she has turned that hatred around into something positive.

"It hasn't been easy, but it has worked," Evers-Williams said.

She said Evers told her not to waste her time and energy on hating people.

Daysha Jefferson, freshman in criminology, agreed with that philosophy.

"Stop hating, because the people you hate aren't worried about you. Most of them don't even know you hate them," Jefferson said. "When people do know you hate them, they don't really even care.

"There's no point in hating. You're just hurting yourself."

Amber Thomas, sophomore in apparel textile marketing, said she also hopes people learned a lot from attending Evers-Williams' speech.

"Hopefully, the speech will change people's lives and compel them to go out and do something," Thomas said.

"I think we should all stop calling each other so many derogatory names."

Evers-Williams said she is not pleased by the disrespectful names used in some popular songs.

"How can we respect ourselves and expect others to respect us?

"Respect begins at home. We respect ourselves and expect it from others," she said.

"Let us not turn the clock backward on ourselves."

SILENCING THE CELL PHONE

Classrooms among places to restrict use

By Wendy Gorman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Love them or hate them, cellular phones are everywhere. No matter where you go, someone has a phone attached to his ear.

Adam Eichman, senior in marketing, relies so much on his cell phone that he didn't bother getting a house phone.

"I take it with me everywhere," Eichman said. "I don't have a house phone."

Society is increasingly dependent upon the convenience of cell phones. The trend is understandable – they go anywhere, often perform multiple functions, and many rate plans offer free long distance.

But should they be used just anywhere?

"I hate it when I'm at a restaurant and somebody's yelling on their cell phone," said Mary Kay Siefers, associate professor of Leadership Studies and Programs.

Siefers said she includes cell-phone usage as part of classroom policy.

"I try to make an announcement at the beginning of the semester and ask students to turn their cell phones off. I know there are times when students will forget, and they're embarrassed when their phone starts ringing."

Students still find ways to keep their phones switched on so they don't miss a call.

"I put it on vibrate," Eichman said. "It went off eight times in class today. It was eight different people. I just kept turning it off."

Judging whether or not to use a cell phone requires simple consideration of others, Siefers said.

"Part of it is students being aware that it is disruptive and can interfere with other students' ability to learn," she said. "Cell-phone etiquette is really no different from any other type of classroom etiquette."

Respect of those around you applies to any setting, including the movie theater.

Movie theaters typically use time during the previews to remind the audience to turn off cell phones and pagers.

Mark Westenmeyer, assistant manager at Seth Childs Cinema, said the majority of moviegoers are attentive to this request.

"At this theater, it is not much of a problem," Westenmeyer said.

In some instances, however, cell-phone usage is simply a bad idea, and people need to learn to turn off the phone completely, Westenmeyer said.

"Definitely not while driving a car. That, I think, is most important," he said.

"But I do love cell phones. They're a pretty handy tool."

Cell phone etiquette

1. Remember that phone conversations are meant to be private discussions, not public ones. Phone conversations, if at all possible, should not take place in public places. Some venues that should be avoided are the obvious ones, where your fellow patrons expect quiet or privacy, such as movie theaters, churches, libraries, etc. When you need to use your mobile phone in public, step off to a more secluded location.

2. Keep the volume down. Mobile-phone users are notorious for nearly screaming into their tiny handsets, thinking that is the only way the person on the other end can hear the conversation. Here's something you may not know: Conventional land lines retransmit your voice back into your earpiece, so you actually hear what you're saying to the person on the other end. Cell phones don't, but the other person can hear you just fine. Stop yelling.

3. Use the vibrate option or keep the ringer volume low. Many mobile phones offer the option to vibrate instead of ringing when you receive a call. If you need to keep your phone on in restaurants or movie theaters because you're expecting an important call, use the vibrate option.

4. Remember that the people you are with should take priority over the person on the phone. If you're already with friends or family members, you need to think about the discomfort those people experience when you're chatting on the phone. If it is an important call, excuse yourself from the meeting or dinner table and keep the call as short as possible.

5. Use Caller ID and voice messages. All mobile-phone providers offer the ability to screen calls with Caller ID and to receive messages via voice mail. The costs are typically low — only a couple of bucks a month — and often are built into the overall monthly fees.

IN BRIEF

The Associated Press

'The Simpsons' hits its 300th episode

The characters may be yellow, but "The Simpsons" hasn't mellowed as it marks its 300th episode Sunday.

In its 14th season, the series (7 p.m. Sunday) can still field top-20 episodes and is the heart of a merchandising empire.

Fox just renewed the program for two more seasons, which will carry it at least through May 2005 and make it the longest-running sitcom ever (with "The Adventures of Ozzie & Harriet" set to fall to second).

HBO trying to sell a sanitized version of 'Sex and the City' to broadcast TV

Three of the four biggest broadcast networks said they have no interest in airing a sanitized version of HBO's Emmy award-winning comedy "Sex and the City."

The fourth network, CBS, would not comment on the possibility Monday.

Published reports, first in Variety on Friday, said HBO had approached executives at ABC, CBS, NBC and Fox about airing an edited "Sex and the City" as a prime-time series, starting this fall.

Music-download site signs deal with leading independent labels

Online music service pressplay has reached deals to distribute music from several leading independent record labels, including Sub Pop and DreamWorks.

The deal Monday brings a host of well-known artists to pressplay, such as Nirvana and Frank Zappa, and expands the selections from the subscription music service to more than 250,000 songs.

PERSONALITY PROFILE

Darwin Abbott
Director of Parking Services

1. What are you having for dinner tonight?
"Lentil soup and bread."

2. What is in your CD player right now?
"Dixie Chicks. I'm not really a big country-western music fan, but I really do enjoy them."

3. What car do you drive?
"I have a 1989 Ford Ranger. It has around 50,000 miles on it, so it is still good to drive."

4. What was the last movie you saw?
"'Men In Black II.' It wasn't as good as 'Men In Black.'"

5. What is your must-see TV show each week?
"'The West Wing.' It's totally unrealistic and idealistic."

6. What is your favorite place to eat?
"Little Apple Brewery. I like the food there a lot."

7. Who is your idol?
"I admire a lot of people, but no one specific is my idol."

8. What is your favorite alcoholic drink?
"Scotch."

9. What was the craziest thing you did in college?
"Well, I couldn't afford a car, so I had a motorcycle. I had to drive to another town to get a part for my friend's motorcycle. The town was 15 miles away and there was a blizzard out. On our way to the town, we got pulled over by the cops because they thought we had stolen the motorcycle because no one in their right mind would be out in a blizzard riding a motorcycle."

10. Have you ever cheated on a test?
"I don't think so."

GOLF | Team hopes to use experience in later action

eighth hole, so he had a chance to birdie his last three.

"A couple of shots here and there makes a big difference," he said.

Northwestern won both the team and individual competitions as Scott Harrington fired a 7-under 209 for the tournament. Northwestern finished 18 strokes ahead of runner-up North Texas with a 1-over 865.

Norris said he was pleased with the play of freshman Ben Kern, who landed in a tie for 22nd place with a score of 226.

"I'm proud of Ben," he said. "He played some good golf in the fall and in qualifying. In fact, he qualified for one of the tournaments but he didn't feel like he was ready to give up a year of eligibility. I know he went home and worked hard over the winter, came back and was playing really good golf.

"He was just a few holes away. He had some double-bogies and worse on a couple of holes, or he's got a top-five finish in his first college event," Norris said. "I'm really encouraged, and obviously, as a freshman, he's got a bright future."

Trouble in Texas

K-State had a hard time finding its stroke at the Rice Intercollegiate on Monday, sitting in ninth place after 36 holes.

6.	K-State	308	297	299	—	904
22.	Aaron Watkins	77	76	73	226	+10
22.	Ben Kern	79	73	74	226	+10
25.	Josh Persons	78	73	76	227	+11
31.	Greg Douglas	74	77	77	228	+12
31.	Matt Van Cleave	77	77	74	228	+12
47.	Jonathan James	81	75	76	232	+16

Finishing in the top half of the field this week, Norris said he was happy with the way his team came back from a rough first round and hopes the men can use that when the team returns to action in two weeks.

"It's still very, very early in our season, but I thought we ended this tournament on a good note," he said. "We got a lot of good experience. Hopefully we can use it to our advantage when we go into San Antonio in a couple of weeks."

K-State's next action is at the University of Texas-San Antonio Intercollegiate on Feb. 24-25 in San Antonio, Texas.

COLORADO | Win helps improve Cat confidence

other one with 3:13 remaining to put K-State up for good.

Colorado, relying on Michel Morandais for offense most of the second half, couldn't counter DeJesus' shot, and the Wildcats' free-throw shooting didn't allow the Buffaloes to make things interesting in the closing seconds.

"We were kind of grindy and gritty out there today," guard Frank Richards said. "We knew it was going to be one of those kinds of games, but we'll take it."

K-State scored just 23 points in the opening half, but still led going into the locker room as Colorado managed just 18.

The Wildcats shot 33.3 percent in the half, plagued by a 1-for-9 performance from behind the arc.

But K-State's defense was able to hold the Buffaloes in check on the other end, and the Cat offense scored 15 points off 16 CU turnovers.

Guards Tim Ellis and Jarrett Hart led the way in the first half with six points each.

All eight of K-State's steals came in the first half.

"We brought more energy than what they did," Richards said. "We just stayed with it."

Once the Buffaloes knotted the contest at 41, the lead changed hands four times before K-State finally took control at 54-52.

Colorado wouldn't make a field goal in the final 3:13.

Hart said it was a matter of the Cats finishing what they started and not letting another team get the best of them late in a game.

"The fact of us wanting it more, limiting our mistakes and getting a lot of hustle plays – which we haven't been getting lately – that got us over the hump," Hart said. "It came down to the same game, a two-point game here and there, but we just overcame and I'm glad we got that weight off our shoulders."

Five players scored in double figures for the Wildcats, led by Ellis, Richards and Hart who each had 11.

Richards also had eight assists and zero turnovers, a turnaround in itself after the junior totaled nine assists and 13 turnovers in the previous two contests.

Richards said Tuesday's contest was all about getting a win and putting some swagger back in the Cats' step.

"We needed it bad," Richards said. "Our confidence was starting to get down, and we were starting to question ourselves. It was a big win for us."

COLUMN | Woman on tour will overcome barriers

he's hung over and 10-over par.

If you don't know much about golf, here's the low-down on Sorenstam.

She's head and shoulders above her nearest competitor on the LPGA tour. She's the Tiger Woods of women's golf. No one can touch her. Sorenstam had 20 top-10 finishes in 23 starts in 2002 while earning roughly $2.9 million.

So let her play and see how she does. If she finishes well, it's another barrier broken down in the quest to have equal comparisons between men and women.

If she places last, oh well. She gave it a shot. Who's really giving her a chance anyway?

But it shows once again that golf can make the best headlines. Two weeks ago, when Tiger said he had to get pain shots last season just to finish a round of golf, the sports world took a step back.

I mean, here's a guy shooting sub-65 rounds on a regular basis, and he's doing it with one good knee – who said golfers aren't athletes?

Today's headline in the golf world pits Phil Mickelson against Woods. Mickelson said Tiger uses "inferior" equipment made by Nike and that he's the only player "good enough to overcome the equipment he's stuck with."

A bad move by Lefty to tick off Tiger, or Nike – especially when he hasn't even touched Woods when it comes to majors. Maybe he should play with "inferior" equipment. Anything to help Mickelson's game.

But with Tiger coming back to the tour this weekend, and Sorenstam possibly making an appearance in late May, it should prove to be an interesting golf season.

Those are the kinds of storylines I prefer to follow. I will take them over football players on suicide watch and basketball players getting busted for marijuana use any time.

LONG RANGE | Cats succeed with key shots

defensive play. He said the energy exerted keeping Michel Morandais and Blair Wilson under their season averages threw off DeJesus and Ellis on offense. However, telling his shooters to hold off was never an option.

"We don't ever talk about abandoning that shot. We know that is part of the strength of our team," he said. "Gilson played a lot of minutes tonight and played absolutely great defense on Morandais. That takes a lot of energy. Tim was chasing Blair Wilson through screens – a lot of energy. We don't tell them not to shoot the 3-point shot."

True to Wooldridge's philosophy, the Cats' top three shooters were all in positions to nail important shots.

DeJesus came alive with his first 3-pointer 4:49 into the second half to extend the Cats' lead to double digits. Hart added another 57 seconds later to give K-State its biggest lead at 13.

After a furious Colorado comeback, Ellis made his only trey of the night to put the Wildcats back on top with 6:28 left.

Then DeJesus drained his final two attempts and put K-State in the lead for good 54-52 with 3:13 to go.

The Cats' long-range bombers battled through a slow start to finally get hot and secure the win. Point guard Frank Richards said the way DeJesus hung in until the end wound up being the difference.

"I told him his shot looked good and to keep it up. He kept shooting and hit some key buckets."

THE STIGMA OF PRETTY

Beautifying treatments not just for women anymore

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Leon Piecuch, 65, is doing something he never would have tried 20 years ago – getting manicures and facials.

"Then, it was something a lot of guys wouldn't consider, and I probably wouldn't have done it either," he said. "Some other guys blazed that trail, and I'm glad they did."

Piecuch, who said he makes appointments at Shear Dynamics every six to eight months, said he has come to enjoy the experience not only for its relaxing effects, but also for the way it helps his skin.

"That skin takes a lot of wear and tear, so it's good to get it refreshed and not let it get too beat up," he said.

Belinda McMillan-Snyder, owner of Shear Dynamics, said she has been in the salon business for 18 years, but in the last five years, male clients have become less reluctant to try services such as waxing, facials, manicures, massage and hair color.

"More people are becoming open to things like this," she said. "We live in a world where people really look at you. Society, unfortunately, takes notice of how a person looks.

"Men have become more conscious about how they look. They want their hands to be moisturized and they want to add color to their hair. I don't think the stigma is there anymore."

McMillan-Snyder said men are still more commonly reluctant to try new services than women. That's why they sometimes take advantage of the privacy offered by panels next to the pedicure thrones, as well as the private rooms where facials and waxing are done.

Since men are more often new to the experience, McMillan-Snyder said they are often more faithful customers.

"It's a new thing to them and they trust you to guide them through something new," she said. "I think once they've done waxing with one person, they don't go out and look for the best price as long as they're satisfied with that person.

"Maybe they're more shy in some of these things. Women have been doing this for years. It's kind of a new concept for men."

Slipping into the ultra-violet light of a tanning bed is no longer reserved for females, either. Rus Schroeder, senior in biology, works at Sunkissed Tanning. Schroeder said he estimates that about 15 to 20 percent of the customers he sees are men, and people don't feel embarrassed about it.

"I think that stigma about being girly went away when they left high school," he said. "When they come to college, people don't think anything of it.

"People want to be tan all over and look good with their clothes off," he said. "And it's OK for guys to want that too."

Curt Theobald, manager in training at Kite's Bar and Grille, said he often has his eyebrows waxed, his hair highlighted, and gets a massage as well as a manicure. Recently he finished helping with the bar's remodeling work. After the job was done, his hands were dry and cracked.

That's when he decided it was time to try something new.

"I had heard about the paraffin treatment they do for hands, and thought I'd give that a try," he said. "It made them soft and they weren't cracked anymore."

Theobald said he gets manicures because he serves people at work, so he wants his hands to look good, and he gets his eyebrows waxed to prevent getting a uni-brow.

McMillan-Snyder said she thinks being rough and having working-man's hands are no longer important to masculinity. Instead, men more often want their hands to be soft and to look well-groomed.

Luke Oplinger, senior in hotel and restaurant management, said he has been setting appointments for massage and highlights for about a year. Oplinger said he found it was relaxing, and kept going back, but some people still aren't ready to try things that might be for women.

"It depends on who you talk to," he said. "Some people think it's odd because I'm a guy, but I like to pamper myself and take care of myself every once in a while."

While highlighting and color are the current fads. Travis Sawyer, senior in political science, remembers when that wasn't the case. Sawyer said that in his hometown of Caldwell, Kan., his father, as well as others, still think it's something that men should avoid.

"It's becoming more common," he said. "I just did it out of boredom. I wanted to try something different with my hair."

McMillan-Snyder said she and the other beauticians she works with try to make men comfortable with such treatments by giving them information and offering them privacy.

Theobald said he enjoys having such treatments, and sometimes recommends them to his friends.

"I think a lot of men do it and don't admit to it," Theobald said. "If you give it a shot once, you'll be amazed at the results."

The art of beauty

A brief explanation of some common beautifying treatments

Manicure: The hands are exfoliated (meaning the dead skin is removed) and massaged, and a the cuticles are treated and shaped. In a pedicure, the same thing is done for the feet, followed by being soaked in warm water. Either can include a paraffin treatment.

Facial: A mask is applied to exfoliate the face and moisturize the skin.

Waxing: Body hair is removed from below the skin by applying warm wax and quickly pulling it off with strips of paper. This technique is employed to shape eyebrows, smooth legs and remove other unwanted hair.

Luke Oplinger, senior in hotel and restaurant management, relaxes as Terr Lauer of Shear Dynamics gives him a 30-minute massage. "I've come here since I started working at Java. It's a good way to unwind," Oplinger said.

DOUBLE TROUBLE

Ohlde, Wecker make for solid offense

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's hard enough to manage one multi-tooled player.

Put two on the same team, and the odds of stopping either go way down.

K-State's opponents have learned the complexity of that challenge firsthand since Kendra Wecker joined Nicole Ohlde in purple last fall.

"What Nicole Ohlde and Kendra Wecker do for this program is literally position us to be a top-20 basketball team," Coach Deb Patterson said. "They are the players that elevate your team and your program to an elite level."

They also provide half the Wildcats' scoring and almost 43 percent of the team's rebounds.

That's no surprise considering the roles K-State's two All-America candidates play in the Wildcat offense. Ohlde's 28 career double-doubles are a school record, and Wecker isn't far behind with 22.

"Those two are the foundation pieces," Patterson said. "Kendra brings the incredible dynamic of athleticism and power that is necessary to compete at a higher level, and Nicole brings consistency, stability and a presence in the paint that is as exceptional as any in the country."

That foundation has been tough to compete against.

Ohlde, averaging 18.5 points and 8.4 rebounds per game, is the only player to be ranked among the top 10 in at least seven Big 12 offensive categories, and Wecker, averaging 20.1 points and 8.8 rebounds per contest, is the only one to rank in the top five in at least five.

Both rank among the conference's top 10 in points and rebounds per game.

"That definitely puts the pressure on other teams," sophomore Megan Mahoney said. "They can't totally double on one or the other because they're both such a threat."

Not that teams haven't tried to limit their touches this season.

Against Missouri last week, the Tigers held Wecker to just 11 points. With her post partner in a rut, Ohlde topped all scorers with a season-high 28 points while Wecker cleaned the glass for 12 rebounds in a 68-51 K-State win.

"It's a great advantage," guard Chelsea Domenico said. "Most teams only have one great inside player, but both of them have every aspect that a post player needs."

Despite teammates' compliments, Wecker and Ohlde remain each other's biggest fans.

"I can definitely feel Ohlde's presence on the inside when she's going strong to the hole and getting rebounds like she does when she dominates on the inside," Wecker said.

The same is true for Wecker, Ohlde said.

"She brings everything to the table," Ohlde said. "It helps our team with Kendra out there with the things she brings to the court."

The Huskers realize what effect the Cats' post tandem can have on a game. In the teams' Jan. 19 meeting, Ohlde netted a game-high 23, a step ahead of Wecker's 22.

Tonight at Bramlage Coliseum, Patterson will be counting on the same sort of output.

"They're certainly in the top 25 nationally," Patterson said, "and in terms of their ability to perform and compete against anyone in the country, player for player, I'd match them up with anybody."

K-State women ready to overcome memory of past loss to Huskers

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It could be hard for K-State to keep from thinking about the past tonight.

When the No. 5 Wildcats (21-2, 8-1) welcome Nebraska (8-12, 1-8) to Bramlage Coliseum at 7 p.m., it will be tough to forget the 34-point whipping K-State handed the Huskers on Jan. 19.

Then again, maybe not.

"It means nothing," Coach Deb Patterson said. "As you compete through this league, you have to bring an understanding of that. There's no question that we're aware of the results of our first game, but that was weeks ago."

The Cats need only look at what happened last year to understand the danger of looking past the Huskers.

After dealing Nebraska a 14-point loss last January at Bramlage Coliseum, the Huskers stunned K-State in Lincoln, 67-52.

It has happened this season, too.

The Wildcats slipped by Iowa State 68-60 on Jan. 15 only to fall behind early and lose to the Cyclones in Ames 74-69 in the teams' second meeting.

This time, however, K-State is taking a different approach.

"We've seen before that anyone can win in this league," said Nicole Ohlde. "Nebraska's going to be coming in hungry for a win, and they're going to be ready to come out and compete hard."

The Huskers probably will need everything they can muster offensively to keep pace with the Big 12's best shooting team. K-State enters the contest averaging 77 points per contest on 49.1-percent shooting, including a 38.1-percent mark from behind the 3-point arc.

Nebraska, on the other hand, is shooting just 37.8 percent from the field and averages a meager 60 points per outing.

But restitution isn't a statistic, even though the Huskers will have plenty in mind during the two-hour trip south to Manhattan.

To combat the Huskers' penchant for revenge, practices have been tough this week, as K-State looks to win at Bramlage for the 18th-straight game.

"The last two days have been pretty intense," sophomore Megan Mahoney said. "We're just trying to get conditioned and get a little snap back into our offense."

The snap was there the last time Nebraska and K-State hooked up.

Four Wildcats finished with double-digit point totals, and K-State out-

Wildcat women face adversity as team is plagued with depleting bench

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the game is on the line, some coaches can look down their bench and see a number of people ready to go.

But some coaches, like K-State's Deb Patterson, don't have that luxury.

The Wildcats sport four starters, Chelsea Domenico, Kendra Wecker, Nicole Ohlde and Megan Mahoney, who average at least 30 minutes per game.

Laurie Koehn is also averaging more than 30 minutes per game this year, but has sat out five of the Cats' last six games.

K-State has substituted Koehn's loss by starting either Amy Dutmer or Brie Madden and bringing in Jessica McFarland and Kimmery Newsom off the bench.

Patterson said lacks the traditional sixth man.

"We really have no depth," Patterson said. "Consequently, we are really depending on every player we have on our roster to be prepared for anything we might put on the table any given night.

"And to be honest, whether that means our sixth player becomes Brie Madden or whether it becomes Jessica McFarland, or Kimmery Newsom, I'm not sure we know. We have to play players out of position."

Still, at 21-2 and tied for first place in the Big 12, K-State is playing players out of position that have gotten the job done.

The Wildcats have shot 49 percent from the field to their opponents' 35 percent this season.

K-State has also been near invincible at home. When Nebraska comes to town on Wednesday, the Huskers will risk becoming victim No. 18 in the sixth-longest home winning streak in the country.

Patterson said the streak is the result of a Wildcat team that works every game knowing there isn't any help waiting in the wings.

"It has really been rewarding to see that, in spite of no depth, they are finding a way to compete well together and to compete hard together," she said.

"Sometimes, when you see us compete and it doesn't look as it may have looked eight weeks ago, that's really why. The challenge for us is going to be to compete through things in spite of that lack of depth and only having so many things we can do."

The Wildcats' ability to do only so many things has been magnified due to the loss of Koehn. Without the sophomore guard, K-State has missed 13.5 points per contest from a shooter who takes the court averaging 43 percent from beyond the arc.

But K-State has persevered.

Patterson said the adversity the team has faced has taught K-State a valuable lesson.

"It has toughened them up, and it will continue to challenge their toughness," she said. "We learned at Iowa State that if everyone is not bringing their very best and we run into adversity, that we are going to have to be tougher than the adversity.

"We can't let ourselves be the enemy. And I think we are learning more about that. It's a lesson you don't necessarily want to have to put your team in a position to deal with, but the reality is, because of who we are, we have to."

Off the bench

The Cats are relatively weak after their starting five. With Laurie Koehn side-lined with an ankle injury, any bench points will come from the following three players.

Nebraska can only hope for better luck in coming year

It's tough to be a player on the Nebraska women's basketball team.

First, there's the whole dilemma of having to go to school in a state that's the undisputed armpit of the Midwest in the city that's the undisputed armpit of the state, if not the world.

BEN FEHR

Nebraska's other sports teams haven't provided any solace. The football team has let a century of sparkling tradition go right down the crapper.

But back to women's basketball. Imagine you're a Husker.

Your leading scorer from a year ago, Keasha Cannon, is sitting out the year due to an undisclosed medical condition.

Then, you enter the conference 0-6 in a year when its best returning talent, Katie Robinette, opts to sit out a season and transfer to conference rival Iowa State rather than play for your team.

Ouch. But the fun doesn't end there.

There's the transition to new Coach Connie Yori, who came to Lincoln after five-year Coach Paul Sanderford resigned due to health complications. (I'm not going to come right out and say it's because he coached at Nebraska but ...)

Yori's done her best, though. She promptly dragged her new team back to her alma mater, Creighton, and fed the Huskers to the team she coached to an NCAA Tournament the year before in the interest of getting one more for the Bluejays. Thanks, coach!

There are the red uniforms, the constant distraction of an administration hell bent on finding an NCAA loophole that would allow both Tom Osborne and Eric Crouch back into the football program and that ridiculous inflatable mascot.

Your only victory in the Big 12 came by way of fellow conference cellar-dweller Oklahoma State.

Then you follow the win by getting blasted by Baylor and horse-whipped by Missouri, two teams K-State throttled in consecutive embarrassments.

Now, you have to get on a bus handed down from the 1994 national champion football team and, barring a breakdown in which you'll certainly be made to run for help, putter toward certain doom at the hands of a K-State team that's already beaten them mercilessly once this season.

It's not like K-State is going to take it easy on you, either.

The Wildcats are riding a 17-game winning streak at Bramlage Coliseum, are tied for first place in the conference, have won 17 of 18, and are ranked No. 5 in the country.

K-State also averages a 20-point win through 23 games.

Your team, however, is averaging just 59.5 points per game, a mark good enough to average a three-point loss through 20 contests.

Your team's namesake lends itself to a system of removing a cornhusk abandoned in the early 1700s. It also seems playing out this season will be as grueling as that time-honored task.

But if the world gives you corn with the husk on, by God, make popcorn.

On the way to Manhattan, as you're looking out the windows of that jalopy bus at the fields where corn will soon be growing in tall, majestic rows, try not to think about the untold truckloads of points Kendra Wecker and Nicole Ohlde are about to realize against your defense.

Dream instead of next season.

It will be a season in which you will have a Cannon at your disposal. Your team will be one year older and wiser.

And it will be another season in which Nebraska fans will have the football team to feel sorry for.

Slow starts becoming usual, problematic for Wildcats

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At 21-2, K-State is off to its best start in school history.

The great irony is, the Wildcats are a slow-starting team.

That has proven to be the case the past two seasons for Coach Deb Patterson's Wildcats. Slow starts and dominating second-half performances have become common.

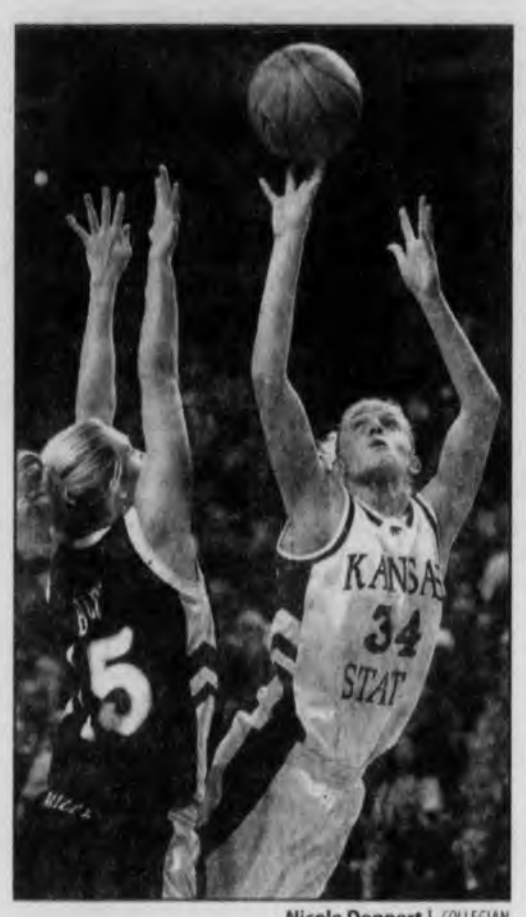
That is not to say Patterson wouldn't be delighted to see her team race out of the gates.

"It's wonderful if we jump on someone," Patterson said. "But I don't bring any expectations to the table."

Perhaps she should.

The past two seasons, all 10 of K-State's losses have come after the Cats have trailed or been tied at the half. That includes a Big 12 semifinal loss to Oklahoma and a loss to Old Dominion in the NCAA Tournament's Sweet 16.

The most extreme example of a slow start remains last season at Colorado, when the Wildcats were unable to rally from a 40-12 halftime deficit, falling 79-58. This season has been no different.



K-State is 18-0 when leading at the break, but is just 3-2 when they trail. On average, the Cats outscore opponents by eight in the first half compared to 11 in the second half.

Part of the reason the Wildcats struggle early may lie with their lack of depth. While K-State has trailed at halftime five times this season, three of those have come in the past five games. That stretch coincides with guard Laurie Koehn's lingering ankle injury.

K-State often looks out of sync in the first half, trying to alleviate some of its depth problems by building large early leads. This early push leads to one of two things: the Wildcats explode in impressive fashion, or they implode in equally unimpressive fashion.

Patterson said mentality has a lot to do with the way K-State starts games.

"We're capable of controlling more on our own end relative to mistakes, relative to decisions we might be making early in the basketball game that I'd like to eliminate," she said.

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN
K-State's Megan Mahoney shoots against Missouri's Kerensa Barr during the Wildcats' 68-52 win over the Tigers last week.

K-State's last two games have been microcosms of the team's early struggles.

At home against Missouri, the Wildcats trailed at halftime 32-29 before outscoring the Tigers 39-20 in the second half on way to a 68-52 victory.

Patterson said that win proves numbers might not always be indicative of the game.

"If we go in halftime down to Missouri and History

The K-State-Nebraska series is the second-longest series in terms of years (27) and the third-longest in games (59) in school history.

100+ points?
Three of K-State's 20 100-point outputs have come against the Huskers, including a 104-103 overtime win in Lincoln on Jan. 18, 1983.

Memories of the 'Old Barn'
A win over Nebraska tonight would give the Cats the most home wins in a season since K-State went 15-1 at Ahearn Field House in 1981-82.

Post presence
K-State has 113 blocks in 2002-03, the second most in school history, next to the 140 last season's squad booked.

SLOW START | 1st-half efforts essential for successful performance against Nebraska

it's a close game and we've been defending well and boarding well, I'm probably OK with that," Patterson said. "But if we're not doing those things as well, then we've got a concern."

But numbers don't lie.

In the first half against Missouri, K-State shot 39.7 percent. Compare that to the blistering 60.9-percent clip in the second half, and one begins to wonder if the disparity was simply a fluke.

But the same story played itself out in the first half Saturday in Waco.

While the Wildcats led Baylor 24-23 at the half, they shot just 32.2 percent from the field.

Wade Trophy candidate Kendra Wecker was just 4-of-16 shooting in the first half.

As usual, the Wildcats regrouped at the half and bolted from the locker room on a 10-2 run, propelling K-State to a 65-53 win.

K-State losses

The Wildcats have trailed at halftime in each of these losses during the last two seasons.

Date	Opponent	Halftime	Final
Nov. 25, 2001	Arizona St.	35-28	75-58
Jan. 19, 2002	at Oklahoma St.	25-25	68-60
Feb. 2, 2002	Iowa St.	47-41	86-72
Feb. 10, 2002	at Nebraska	37-31	67-52
Feb. 13, 2002	Oklahoma	29-22	76-68
Feb. 23, 2002	at Colorado	40-12	79-58
March 7, 2002	Oklahoma	45-28	69-49
March 23, 2002	Old Dominion	45-21	88-62
Nov. 30, 2002	Stanford	29-27	63-57
Jan. 29, 2003	at Iowa St.	38-30	74-69

With seven regular season games remaining, including an impending clash with No. 10 Texas Tech, K-State's first-half efforts could prove critical.

"I think by and large, in this league, it will be unusual if games aren't close, especially early in the game," Patterson said.

HUSKERS | Patterson: Nebraska will prove more challenging based on league progress rebounded the Huskers 38-36 in the most lopsided win in series history.

There will be more on the line tonight, though, as the Wildcats jockey for the top spot in the league standings with just seven conference games left before the Big 12 Tournament.

"We can't go into the game with big heads," guard Chelsea Domenico said.

"When we do that, it kind of gets us off to a slow start. We're just going out to play another Big 12 opponent – the score can change at any time, and anyone's competitiveness can change, too."

Patterson said she's counting on a better game from the Huskers this time around.

"I expect every team in this league is making forward progress, and I certainly believe they'll be highly motivated to bring their very best," Patterson said.

"I really respect our team's ability to keep that perspective where it needs to be. I know our team brings great respect for their Big 12 opponents."

Nuclear agency assures peace

Tension rises in North Korea case

By George Jahn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VIENNA, Austria – The U.N. nuclear agency on Wednesday raised the stakes in the standoff with North Korea, reporting the reclusive communist government to the Security Council for violating its international obligations.

The International Atomic Energy Agency's 35-nation board of governors made the decision – a last resort after months of intransigence by Pyongyang – in an emergency session at the agency's headquarters in Vienna.

In Washington, meanwhile, intelligence officials warned that North Korea has an untested ballistic missile capable of reaching the western United States. The North Korean missile is a three-stage version of the Taepo Dong 2, said Vice Adm. Lowell Jacoby, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer praised the IAEA action, calling it a clear indication that the international community will not accept North Korea's nuclear program. He said the conflict pits North Korea against the world, not just the United States.

"This is a matter to be settled through diplomacy," Fleischer said. "North Korea has taken provocative steps that cause great concern across the world." He accused Pyongyang of marching back in time by defying the international community.

But Mohamed ElBaradei, the agency's chief, said the IAEA would continue to work for a diplomatic end to the crisis.

"It was the unanimous view of all the board members that we're looking for a peaceful resolution," ElBaradei told reporters.

"The agency, of course, is not washing its hands of the

For now, Becky Taylor will stick to the old adage of not dating within the workplace.

"I had a fifth-grader hit on me," Taylor said. "He just walked up and said 'Hey, how are you doing?'"

Taylor, freshman in elementary education, is one of many K-State students who works at local elementary schools during lunch time. She works at Northview Elementary School, monitoring the children during lunch and on the playground afterward.

Taylor's duties include attending to students' needs during lunch, handing out bathroom passes and regulating behavior on the playground.

"It's hard being mean," she said. "I'm sure I'll get used to it, but we were told not to be easy on them because we're new and they'll try to test us."

Principal Katie Philp said the lunchtime assistants are important to the school. Teachers are guaranteed duty-free lunches, Philp said, so having students and parents assisting during the lunch period are a huge help in freeing the teachers' lunch period.

Northview put applications on the K-State Career and Employment Services Web site, Philp said, and the response was tremendous.

So many students were interested that Philp has been referring them to other elementary schools, she said.

Chris Cook, junior in golf course management, said he found the job listed on the CES Web site. He said the job fits perfectly into his schedule, and he enjoys spending time with children.

"It's an adventure," Cook said, "trying to watch 200 kids on the playground at once."

Cook works about 90 minutes a day during lunch, four days a week.

Philp said the time usually is not a problem, and most of the college students work whatever

Kansas livestock owners receive alert to possibility of bioterrorism attack

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A warning was issued yesterday by Kansas Livestock Commissioner George Teagarden to alert all Kansas livestock owners to the possibility of bioterrorism.

This warning is in addition to the Homeland Alert declared by Homeland Security Director Tom Ridge.

With the nation on an orange alert, there is some indication that there could be a terrorist threat. Teagarden said this is the first time this alert level has included livestock.

"We want to raise the awareness and alertness of the livestock owners in Kansas that livestock is included in the alert," he said, "and that they (livestock owners) should raise their awareness and vigilance around their operations."

Teagarden said he suggests that any incoming livestock be checked for any unusual disease symptoms and that livestock owners should make sure they know who is around their operations.

There are many diseases that could be spread through livestock, some being more contagious that others, Teagarden said.

"The sooner we know about it, the sooner we can accomplish our mission," he said. "Sometimes every minute and every hour counts in the control process."

The possibility of bioterrorism is not present in Kansas alone.

"Kansas hasn't been specifically pointed out as a target," Teagarden said. "This is an overall alert across the U.S."

Although Kansas is not a specific target, the state does produce a large portion of the U.S.'s beef supply, so bioterrorism could be a problem.

"Bioterrorism is important in Kansas, Texas and Nebraska because these three states are always 1-2-3 in total beef

HVAC staff works year-round to maintain air conditioners, remains busiest in winter

By Allyson Knight
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Keeping students cool when hot weather strikes is a year-round job for Jared Hothan and his co-workers.

Hothan, senior in construction science, works for the HVAC shop, which is responsible for all of the air conditioning on campus. During the winter months, employees retrieve the window air conditioning units and take them to the HVAC shop, where they are repaired and cleaned by technicians. They then put the units back in the buildings.

CAMPUS JOBS

The Collegian takes a closer look at students who earn their college cash on campus.

"We are busier during the winter, when we go from building to building pulling air conditioners, anticipating for summer," Hothan said. "When it starts to get cold, we begin winterizing because it is good to have the units ready for when they need them."

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN
Jared Hothan (left), senior in construction science, and Ryan Davis, senior in finance, load window air conditioners from Seaton Hall to clean and get ready for summer use. "We sweat, so you don't have to," Davis said.

Justin Befort, senior in history, said that although the majority of the work is completed during the winter months, there is still plenty for workers to do the rest of the year.

"We still pull [air conditioners] during the summer, but when we are not doing that, we clean the outside air units with acid and wash them, " Befort said.

Befort has been employed at the HVAC shop for about 10 months and earns $6.50 per hour. He works about 20 hours per week and said he enjoys the leniency of the job.

"They work around your class schedule and leave the schedule up to the students,"

SPOTLIGHT | Harry Potter Professional

Professor uses Potter expertise to educate K-Staters, students from other schools

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State houses a number of professors who are experts in their respective fields, including agriculture, architecture, engineering and Harry Potter.

The popularity of J.K. Rowling's Harry Potter novels has sparked conversations and arguments alike, and Philip Nel, assistant professor of English, knows why. He is, after all, an expert.

In 2001, Nel published a book on the series. The Japanese translation of Nel's book, "J.K. Rowling's Harry Potter Novels: A Readers Guide," came out the following year.

He also wrote and published an essay on the series titled "The Ivory Tower and Harry Potter: Perspectives on a Literary Phenomenon," which also came out in 2002. This July he has been invited to be a keynote speaker at "Nimbus 2003: The Harry Potter Symposium," in Orlando, Fla.

Nel said the Listserv members asked him to attend the symposium after they used discussion questions from his readers guide, but he declined because of time and financial constraints. However, Nel said that when the group offered to cover all of his expenses, he decided to accept the invitation.

At the symposium, Nel will present his speech "What Makes a Professor Behave Like a Snape? Literature, Marketing and the Critical Backlash Against Harry Potter."

He said the initial critical responses to the series were negative for several different reasons. Nel said that although the critics might have had different complaints about the series, they have one thing in common.

"They tend to conflate the literary works with the marketing phenomenon," he said. "So, the question I'd take up would be, 'How does one evaluate a literary work, such as Potter, produced at a point in time when marketing and children's literature are intertwined?' This is the question that they (critics) fail to ask, and that is the question that I will ask."

Nel also teaches a class on the series, "Harry Potter's Library: J.K. Rowling, Texts and Contexts."

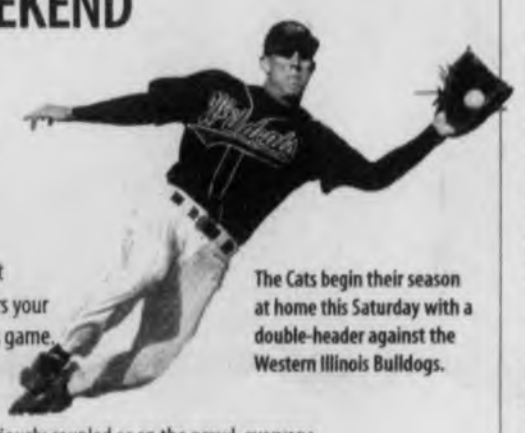
Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN

Philip Nel, assistant professor of English, is considered an expert on J.K. Rowling's Harry Potter novels. He is teaching "Harry Potter's Library: J.K. Rowling, Texts and Contexts," and he wrote a book called "J.K. Rowling's Harry Potter Novels: A Readers Guide."

In the class, Nel said, students read the Potter novels and the works of Rowling's antecedents, influences and contemporaries, including works from Thomas Hughes, Elizabeth Goudge, E. Nesbit, C.S. Lewis and Roald Dahl.

"It's important for students to understand that Harry Potter does not emerge from nowhere, but is part of various literary traditions," he said. "We read the Harry Potter novels themselves and secondary sources on those novels."

Nel said the hype surrounding the Potter novels has led some to dismiss the series' as manufactured. However, he said the novels' popularity caught on via word-of-mouth before Warner Brothers' marketing campaign, and therefore the novels are very literary.



Nel said he finds the series interesting because the books work on multiple levels.

"I don't mean only that there are levels that grown-ups may get and levels that children may get," he said. "Rather, I mean that they have layers of meaning. Books like these reward rereading because when you reread, you often catch things you missed the first time – you pick up extra resonances that had slipped by you on previous readings."

OPINION

TO THE POINT

U.S. needs to focus more on North Korea

The U.N. nuclear agency on Wednesday reported to the U.N. Security Council that North Korea was violating its international obligations, while U.S. intelligence officials warned that North Korea had missiles capable of reaching the U.S. West Coast.

However, despite brief comments from White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, the Bush administration was silent.

Fleischer called the nuclear crisis a matter to be settled through diplomacy. With the Bush administration gunning for military action against Iraq, it is ironic that military action isn't even being considered.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

With officials warning that time is running out for Iraq's compliance to eliminate its supposed weapons of mass destruction, North Korea's blatant defiance is shoved aside without a word.

Secretary of State Colin Powell speaks daily to the Congressional committees, yet he too remains silent on North Korea.

The American public has not been presented with evidence that shows Iraq's arms pose a direct threat to their nation, other than the fear of chemical warfare.

North Korea, on the other hand, possesses ballistic missiles, which threaten the West Coast.

Why, then, is the Bush administration willing to settle what could be a bigger threat to national security through diplomacy, while they stockpile arms and troops on the borders of Iraq?

Fleischer said that proactive steps to advance its nuclear programs have elevated concerns of North Korea's threat to the global community.

Iraq, however, has taken proactive steps this week to submit to interviews of its scientists and allowance of U-2 surveillance planes in the inspection process.

Yet, the United States single-mindedly focuses on a war with Iraq.

If the Bush administration's foreign policy is going to include aggressive Homeland Security measures, the American public deserves to hear the government's stance on the severity of this North Korean threat.

IDOLIZING THE STARS

Oscar nominations reflect popular Hollywood obsession

Illustration by Ben Dolezal | COLLEGIAN

Despite working well into the wee hours of the morning, you can count me amongst the strange breed of humans that awoke for solely one purpose Tuesday morning – to watch the Academy Award nominations announced live.

CHRIS HARROP

Would this writer have found out about them just as easily had I picked up the Collegian or found a link to the nominees on a Web site somewhere?

There is no doubt. However, it takes a dedication, passion and a general lack of good judgment to keep up with the movie industry's self-congratulatory traditions.

The obsession with Hollywood in awards season is a strange phenomenon for modern society, one that many of my associates in anthropology should look into studying. As logic stands, there should be a rational explanation for our allegiance to this film industry stalwart.

One possibility suggests our consumer culture has devolved into a nation of addictive voyeurs, willing to swallow whatever is fed to us without regard to the metaphorical nutrition the media may provide. Sure, there are legions of robots out there that are programmed to immediately accept a reviewer's praise or distaste for "Kangaroo Jack."

On the other hand, a trip to the megaplex has become a common cultural event for many Americans. Despite the enormity of cinema complexes, the inept concession workers, the barrage of advertisements disguised as "pre-feature entertainment" and inevitable cell-phone interruption, we still enjoy the allure of sitting in the dark with complete strangers, experiencing the same stories and images.

Undoubtedly, there are a slew of people who keep track of the Academy Awards, Golden Globes, BAFTA's, SAG's, DAG's and critics' circle recognitions, only hoping to vindicate their fine choice of pop culture. As my fine "SLC Punk!" friends Stevo and Heroin Bob would say, these people are "trendy-ass poseurs." They must be located and given dirty looks.

Ultimately, these award shows are a good idea gone wrong. What they amount to today are political struggles that stimulate that economy more than any Texan with visions of tax cuts in his head ever could.

Studios spend millions of dollars on campaigns to get their films recognized and awarded.

Trade publications, Web sites and television become inundated with ads for an individual, cast or crew achievement. Free DVDs are distributed for screening purposes, many of them later appearing on eBay or Yahoo! auctions.

Want your own copy of "The Pianist" or "The Hours" to view at home, instead of driving to the art houses in downtown Kansas City, Mo.? It's only a click away.

At its core, the Academy Awards are an industry's annual recognition of merit, something every business should strive to do. Since then, it has been molded to meet individual needs.

Studios can maximize their rental and video sales with a few statuettes in March. Everyday people can try and revive the mystic the film industry once had decades ago by tuning into the pre-pre-show coverage on "E! Television." Actors, directors and crew members can secure more than a year's worth of work offers with a single trip to the stage.

In the end, everyone is satisfied, if not a bit flustered, by all the commotion and hubbub. It might not matter to some that Billy Bob Thornton got robbed a year ago or that Meryl Streep got her trillionth Oscar nomination the other day.

Still, it is all in good fun. Now we can go back to spending the next month debating who has momentum heading into Hollywood's Super Sunday.

That's right, 'Buffy the Vampire Slayer' teaches life lessons

I have a confession. I am an avid "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" fan.

I know it's not the most intellectually stimulating show on television, but I just can't get enough of it. Despite her California-girl dialect and sometimes cliché problems, Buffy has taught me some valuable life lessons.

NASRINA BURNETT

Women can kick butt.

Even though Buffy is totally feminine, she still beats the heck out of some really big monsters. There is a pervasive stereotype in our culture that a woman is either prissy or a tomboy, but never a combination of the two. Buffy demonstrates that a girl can look nice, wear stylish clothes and still be the toughest kid on the block.

Just because she slays doesn't mean Buffy should give up her personality. Her positive example reminds us that if a woman is athletic or assertive, it does not mean that she is trying to be like a man. What it does mean is that she is brave enough to reject the restricting definitions of what a woman should be. You go, girl!

Don't date a vampire.

A guy doesn't have to be an undead bloodsucker to have vampirelike traits. Some regular guys just act like vampires. These guys may seem sexy and mysterious, but dating a strictly nocturnal being isn't in a girl's best interest, slayer or not. If he can't (or won't) show his face during the day, he isn't really going to be able to commit to a long-term relationship.

Buffy's relationship with Angel taught her that even if he seems like a decent guy in the beginning, he's bound to go after your neck at some point. After the necking, it's all over and you're stuck with a scar on your neck and an even worse one on your heart.

Talent Doesn't Make the Slayer.

Just because someone is born with superhuman abilities doesn't mean life experiences can't send them down the wrong path. The battle of nature versus nurture often ends with nature on the losing side. Buffy's co-slayer, Faith, demonstrates what can happen when one of the chosen ones chooses the wrong path.

Faith has been neglected her entire life, and because she hasn't learned to love and be loved, she falls in with the wrong crowd (namely a demon who wants to destroy the world). The lesson is, even if the world has done you wrong, use your talents to help others.

Parents shouldn't know too much.

Buffy's mother is completely unaware of her daughter's special place in the universe until the end of season two. When she finds out that Buffy is a slayer, her reaction is to kick Buffy out of the house. Parents just don't always understand what their children are going through. Our parents kept secrets from their parents, and we should follow their example.

Your mom really doesn't need to know that you've been spending more time in Aggieville than on campus, now, does she? And don't tell dad that you maxed out your credit card for that spring break trip. Part of becoming an adult is dealing with things by yourself and letting your parents experience the bliss of ignorance.

Never judge based on appearance.

Looks aren't everything. Some of the most dangerous demons Buffy has battled have looked completely harmless. For example, the vampire that led Buffy to her first death was a child, and the demon that tried to steal her soul while she slept was her normal-looking college roommate.

Conversely, some very superficially unattractive people have been good at heart. The shrouded character that helps Buffy and Angel discover where Faith's loyalties were pledged was definitely not nice-looking.

We all know we shouldn't judge people based on their appearances, but knowing and doing are two different things. Remember to step back and try to understand what motivates others before attempting to stake them.

On a similar vein, remember to take a deeper look at television programming before resorting to mockery. Buffy might not be quite as silly as she sounds.

Whoever thinks walking is exercise is probably fat.

Why am I proud that I went to high school with the hottest Classy Cat?

I was just wondering if Paul Restivo really does have a penis.

Hey, we need to get rid of Paul Restivo. This is getting hilarious.

NASCAR draws a bigger crowd than the other sporting events at other stadiums.

If at first you don't succeed, screw it. Start drinking.

Hi, my name is Julie. I'm not fat. I'm thin, and I'm sexy. How do you like that?

Yeah, did anyone else notice that the men's basketball team's uniforms tops and bottoms don't match? Way to go, K-State.

Wow, Tom Fontana. If I were you, I'd think twice before insulting NASCAR again. Word on the street is that some kids are looking for you.

Hey, Tom, if NASCAR is not a sport, then why is it on the sports page?

Everybody just needs to relax. Paul Restivo is just joking. Don't take it so seriously, and have a sense of humor.

I don't know about anybody else, but I am really sick of Black History Month already.

If it wasn't for out-of-state tuition, I wouldn't be stuck here, and I'd be a happy little Husker.

Life is tough. It's even tougher when you're stupid.

I'm a brick wall with a penis.

Paul Restivo, you know nothing about gender inequality.

I am ashamed and sad to say that I actually just voted for somebody on "American Idol."

Tom Fontana, your one-sided, liberal view of NASCAR is terrible. I hope you get hit by a car.

I think NASCAR is great. What other sport when you finish do you get a trophy from a hot babe?

Paul, you're truly an idiot. Until you've had your feet in forceps, your nether regions exposed to everybody in an operating room, and giving birth to a child, you don't know how easy you have it.

Hiles, Sumner enter race

Pair files to run for student body president, vice president

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN
Ashleigh Sumner, left, senior in kinesiology, and Julie Hiles, right, junior in kinesiology, are running for student body vice president and president. Primary elections are Feb. 25 and 26.

They are taking a chance. A big one.

But it is one they hope will inspire other students to challenge themselves.

"We want to say, 'Hey, look at us. We are here, and we don't have tons of credentials,'" Julie Hiles said. "We want to be a stepping stone for other students to achieve something they didn't think they could."

Hiles, junior in kinesiology, and Ashleigh Sumner, senior in kinesiology, filed for student body president and vice president, respectively, Monday, after a weekend of ensuring that they have solid platform issues.

"We wanted to make sure we are doing this for the right reasons," Sumner said. "Our platforms will be based on realistic issues – ones that are obtainable and easy to understand."

Their tentative platform, "Little things, big changes," will contain three basic ideas. The first will focus on listening to what students want.

"Students always have something on their minds," Sumner said. "They complain in the Fourum, to their friends and at the bars. We want to listen to those complaints and find ways to fix the problems."

While the candidates know they can't solve dilemmas like higher tuition rates – goals that they say are unattainable – they do know they can focus on details that can make college life easier.

"We want to focus on setting up book exchanges," Hiles said. "Smaller ideas that will make college more affordable. While we can't change the fact tuition is increasing, we can focus on little things that make college life easier."

The pair's second platform issue – a focus on health and fitness – springs from their shared major.

"Health and fitness are extremely important to us," Hiles said. "We believe that everybody on campus has some body image problem and we think the key to changing that is through better self-esteem. A student body with better self-esteem and better health will contribute more to the university. It is a win-win situation."

That self-esteem will be achieved through education about health and fitness and also through promoting campus exercise programs.

"The Rec is offering a spring break exercise program that is already full," Sumner said. "There are so many more programs like that on campus that students can take advantage of."

Finally, the pair wants to focus on smaller organizations and less-recognized majors.

"We can do something for everyone," Hiles said. "An organization does not have to be huge to do great things. We want to encourage those smaller groups and help get them the recognition they deserve."

These ideas, the pair says, are basic, simple and easy to understand.

"I know people are reading all the candidate's platforms and thinking, 'What will this do for me?'" Sumner said, "but our platforms are obtainable. They are for everybody. If I was reading this, I would like it. I would vote for us."

Budget cuts affect county departments; public works suffer road repair set backs

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley County departments are piecing together what's left of their budget after Gov. Kathleen Sebelius announced state cuts that will leave the county with a loss of more than $900,000.

Johnette Mueller, budget and finance officer for Riley County, said cuts in demand transfers are effective immediately. That means almost no state funding for Riley County.

"I don't believe the county has ever been in this situation," she said. "I don't know that the county has ever had to cut this amount of money from their budget at one time."

Mueller said county commissioners approved a budget that would allow for demand transfer cuts, while cushioning expenditures made before the budget was approved.

She said the parks and information systems funds will be affected the most, receiving more than 20 percent and 16 percent of cuts, respectively.

Demand transfers totaled $923,540.

Counties will, however, still receive city-county funds for highways, but funding for 2004 remains uncertain.

"We'll still get special city-county highway money, about $1 million for 2003," she said. "Normally, this money is budgeted out of the state's general fund, but we've received a notice that the state's '04 budget will be out of the KDOT reserves."

This is a trend that concerns county officials like Mueller.

"It's coming out of a reserve fund, which means, once those reserve funds are gone, well, we don't know what will happen," she said.

For 2003, however, only 6.5 percent of planned budget cuts will be from the Department of Public Works – a department responsible for maintaining Riley County's roads and bridges.

Dan Harden, director of public works for Riley County, said that although the public works fund will be cut by about $250,000, there is still more than $3.5 million left in their budget.

"There is stuff that won't get done, but that is just how the game is played," he said. "They just don't have the dollars to fund various things."

Harden said budget cuts will affect road and bridge operations, with some county roads receiving less maintenance or repair as in normal years. He said spending will depend on weather conditions, with rock expenses during a wet summer or winter road work during a wet winter.

"This is a pretty manageable thing, really," he said. "My guess is, by the end of August we will not have purchased much road rock due to a dry summer. If we get 60 inches of rain between now and the end of the year, that's an entirely different set of circumstances."

Rod Meredith, assistant director of public works, said the department also will cut costs in parts and tools, building maintenance, training and office supplies. He said that although no one has been laid off, a hiring freeze on seasonal employees will affect productivity.

Meredith said seasonal employees make up almost 25 percent of the department's work force, with three-fourths consisting of students.

"That will slow us down not having seasonal labor to help out with work," he said. "Probably all county roads will be affected. There will be a reduction in efficiency, we'll have to mow half as often, and it will take longer to plow roads."

Budget reductions don't make Harden lose sleep, however.

Harden, a county employee since 1974, said that although this is the first year demand transfers will be cut, he has seen worse.

"We've managed through a lot more significant problems than this will present, like five or six years ago, when the budget request for bridge and roads were cut over $1 million," he said.

"This is relatively minor surgery. In the road fund there is a whole bunch of revenue sources. Demand transfers are kind of a minor revenue source compared to other sources like local sales tax and tax on gas."

However, Harden said he wouldn't be surprised if there are more cuts in the future.

"They're in a legislative session until late April," he said. "Every day they're in session they could cut more."

Hale Library uses new electronic delivery system

Interlibrary loan system connects libraries across U.S.; Hale uses as way to save time, money

By Tristan Hinderliter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Interlibrary Services at Hale Library will save $1,000 a month in paper and supplies and save 30 percent of the staff's time as the result of a new electronic delivery system for borrowed magazine articles, said Cherie Geiser, head of Interlibrary Services.

"This is the best thing we've done in the last five years," she said.

The interlibrary loan system connects thousands of libraries across the United States and overseas, Geiser said, giving patrons access to a vast source of references.

Until November, K-State had exchanged articles with other libraries via first-class mail. It usually would take a week for articles to arrive, Geiser said. The new system allows patrons to fill out a request form on the Hale Library home page, and their requested articles are sent in about two days.

"Everybody loves it. I've heard several positive comments from graduate students and faculty."

Cherie Geiser
HEAD OF INTERLIBRARY SERVICES

Articles are received from their sources electronically using the Ariel Desktop Document Delivery system, then Interlibrary Services converts the information into Portable Document Format files.

The PDF files are loaded onto the World Wide Web, and patrons are notified by e-mail that their document has been received. They are given a personal identification number and the location of the loaned document on the Web.

Geiser said she has had nothing but positive feedback from patrons who have used the new system.

"Everybody loves it," she said. "I've had several positive comments from graduate students and faculty."

Larry Noble, professor of kinesiology, said he requests about 12 articles each year from the interlibrary loan system.

"The PDF file is nice," he said. "Of course, you pay your own copy costs – otherwise, it's free, and it takes a little longer. So it just depends on how big a hurry that I would be in to get it, whether I would prefer to get it a few days earlier as opposed to pay the cost of my printer to print it out."

Noble said he thinks it is handy to have an electronic copy of the material so he can save it and send it to somebody else later if he wishes.

Since articles can be accessed from any computer anywhere in the world, the new delivery system will be especially advantageous to distance education students and professors who are on sabbatical in foreign countries, Geiser said.

"What really precipitated the ability to quickly implement this new function was the budget crisis," she said. "I've been talking about this for several years, but it's just amazing what a little budget crisis will do."

More cuts are ahead for the library, Geiser said.

For instance, she said, Hale Library is in the process of cutting $850,000 worth of magazines and journals.

Fewer periodicals on the shelves means students and faculty will have to come to Interlibrary Services to get the information.

"Thank goodness we have this," Geiser said, "because now we can very, very quickly supply the magazine articles."

U.S. scales down request to NATO on Iraq; plan rejected

By Paul Geitner
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium – France, Germany and Belgium rejected a scaled-down U.S. proposal Wednesday for NATO preparations in case of war in Iraq, prolonging the alliance's worst internal crisis since the end of the Cold War.

"They haven't changed their mind," NATO spokesman Yves Brodeur. "They still feel the time is not right for NATO to make a decision."

Emergency consultations that began Monday would resume Thursday, but it was unclear when.

"The strategy is to keep working, essentially," he said, adding that no new proposal was being considered.

For the past month, the holdouts have blocked the start of military planning to help defend Turkey – the only NATO member bordering Iraq. France, Germany and Belgium say such a step could undercut U.N. efforts to resolve the Iraq crisis peacefully.

Diplomats had said the three holdouts still wanted to link any decision at NATO to Friday's report to the U.N. Security Council on Iraq's cooperation with U.N. weapons inspectors.

NATO ambassadors received the compromise proposal at a 90-minute morning session, after a day of frantic telephone contacts among capitals. German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer also made an unscheduled flight to Paris for talks on the Iraq crisis.

Formal talks resumed in Brussels at 8 p.m. and were over in about an hour.

The compromise deals solely with defensive measures for Turkey and cuts out peripheral requests, such as stepping up guards at U.S. bases in Europe and replacing any NATO troops on peacekeeping duty who may be moved to the Gulf.

Nebraska's getting desperate

Governor's player-pay proposal won't transpire

In the midst of the college basketball season, some interesting news stories have been developing just north of the border in Nebraska.

In the months following the Huskers' first losing football season since 1962, there has been a significant amount of scrambling in Lincoln. On Wednesday, however, a flood of announcements came forth.

CHRIS SHANK

Yesterday, Nebraska Gov. Mike Johanns showed his desperation for winning football in Cornhusker country when he announced his backing of a legislative proposal to pay Nebraska football players. His argument: football players are exploited and unable to capitalize on work that generates millions of dollars under the status quo.

"Paying the players would be above board and straightforward," Johanns said. "College football has become a multimillion-dollar industry that should do much better for its athletes."

Except for at the University of Kansas, where the football program loses money faster than Enron.

The bill was proposed by a Nebraska senator and, if enacted, would require football players to be paid a stipend. One stipulation is it would take effect only after three other Big 12 states passed similar legislation.

The idea of paying college athletes is not a new one. But this announcement got me hypothesizing about which other Big 12 Conference states would join in with this payola.

Forget about Iowa. Half the state bleeds Hawkeye black and gold, which means they would never legalize paying Cyclone players.

In Kansas, a state so strapped for cash it can't pony up enough printed line schedules for its colleges, legislators in Topeka would have a heyday dismissing a bill like that.

Missouri, on the other hand, doesn't have an ethical person within its borders, so Nebraska could count on the "Border Ruffians" to vote yes.

Out in Colorado, Coach Gary Barnett probably would schedule a recruiting party for office holders at the statehouse in Denver. So after a long night of joints, Bacardi and CU co-eds, the congressmen would end up like Buff recruits and sign anything Barnett shoved in front of them. So Coach Frank Solich then would be only one state away from paying players.

In the Big 12, the South is where Solich would start to run into problems. Oklahoma, unlike Nebraska, doesn't need the law on its side to pay its football players. Beginning in the days of Barry Switzer, the football players' parking lot at OU rivals even that of the Cash Money Millionaire's fleet of smooth rides.

In Texas, the state's board of regents won't be able to pay football players anytime soon, since they already are having to pay Texas A&M Coach

Unlikely scorers spark K-State win

McFarland, Dutmer hurt Husker defense

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Deb Patterson knew anything could happen before taking the floor for Wednesday night's 64-47 win over Nebraska.

But what Patterson had in the works for the Huskers (8-13, 1-9) duped all 9,426 in attendance at Bramlage Coliseum.

With No. 5 K-State (22-2, 9-1) leading 7-2 at the 16:18 mark in the first half, Patterson sent Jessica McFarland to the scorer's table.

"As the game unfolded, I decided I really wanted to mix our combinations a little bit and challenge our team along those lines," Patterson said.

It turns out McFarland was only a challenge for the Huskers.

Beginning the night averaging just 2.8 points and 1.3 rebounds in 16 appearances, the freshman capitalized with points on three of her first four touches as the Cats built a 25-14 lead by the 5:12 mark.

"I just came in and tried not to lose anything and just tried to be as productive as I could," McFarland said.

By the end of the half, McFarland had six points and three rebounds in 14 minutes, and K-State had a 34-16 lead.

"It was very important for Jessica to have that opportunity to come up, gain a little bit of confidence and assert herself," Patterson said.

While McFarland was gaining experience in the post, the Cats were busy shutting down Nebraska on defense.

K-State converted nine Husker turnovers into 11 points and held Nebraska to its lowest halftime point total of the season.

"We brought great defense in the first half," Patterson said.

The offense wasn't too bad, either.

With All-America candidates Kendra Wecker and Nicole Ohlde on the bench for much of the first period, Amy Dutmer was posting rare points as well.

The York, Neb., product – ignored as a shooting threat on several K-State possessions – led all Wildcat scorers in the first 20 minutes with a career-high 12 points, including six off 3-pointers.

Jessica McFarland scrambles for a loose ball against Nebraska's Alexa Johnson during the first half of Wednesday's 64-47 victory. McFarland scored seven points in 17 minutes of play.

K-State's halftime lead might have looked familiar, but the statistics behind it were anything but ordinary.

"I loved it," Wecker said. It was fun just to sit there and watch. That just shows the depth of our team. That's what we need off our bench, and they did a great job tonight."

Not to be outdone, the Wildcats' normal scorers got their points in the second half.

Mahoney extends recent scoring surge against Nebraska

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Megan Mahoney is a streaky scorer.

Fortunately for K-State, those streaks can last for a long time and come in bunches.

Mahoney tallied 13 in the Wildcats' 64-47 dismantling of Nebraska on Wednesday night at Bramlage Coliseum. The performance capped a six-game stretch in which Mahoney is averaging 14 or more points per contest.

Mahoney said K-State's first-half effort was better than its second.

"We played pretty good defense in the first half," Mahoney said. "But in the second half, we had some breakdowns and gave them open shots. It was good we communicated and got things going again.

"Eventually, we were able to get some stops on defense and build on the lead."

Mahoney has been helping K-State build leads all season.

Early in the Wildcats' season, a stretch from Nov. 24 through Dec. 6, Mahoney averaged 21 points per game in contests against Penn State, Temple, Stanford, Arkansas-Pine Bluff and Middle Tennessee State.

The junior then went cold against Weber State, scoring just five in the Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic.

Mahoney came back, though, to put up 15 at Wisconsin-Green Bay and followed the Wildcats' win over the Phoenix with 20 against Western Michigan and 13 against Northern Illinois.

Mahoney threw in 19 against Iowa, 14

Sophomore Oklahoma State transfer dazzles in Wildcat equestrian debut

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Perfection is a rarity in sports.

Sophomore Western rider Erin Peery is one athlete, however, who can say her career in Manhattan has been nearly perfect.

In K-State's first show of the spring season, Peery went to the ring for the first time not only as a Wildcat, but also for the first time in the reigning class.

Nobody in the crowd would have believed it, though.

On Saturday, Peery was crowned Reining B champion in addition to winning the Open Horsemanship B class en route to High-Point honors.

But Peery wasn't finished.

She equaled the feat less than 24 hours later with victories in Reining A and Open Horsemanship A competitions on her way to tying senior teammate Amanda Gigot for High-Point honors once again.

"I just wanted to come in and do my best for the team and show I earned a spot," Peery said. "It was a lot of fun."

Count second-year equestrian coach Lindsay Breidenthal among those impressed with Peery's debut.

"I'm very excited with her performance, the way she rode," Breidenthal said. "We're just looking forward to what she can do for us in the future.

"She rode very strong. She impressed the crowd, the judges and the team."

Although she is a newcomer to the program, Peery comes to K-State with tremendous experience.

"She transferred from Oklahoma State and rode very well for them," Breidenthal said. "She's done American Quarter Horse Association for a number of years, and she's ridden with some of the top coaches in the country. She has a lot of experience on horseback, and she's a great addition to our team."

Peery has shown at Quarter Horse events since she was five years old and has served on its executive committee. She placed 11th at the AQHA World Championships in 2001.

"I've traveled my whole life showing horses," Peery said. "It teaches a lot of dedication and hard work. Everything is goal-orientated, and I've learned a

PREPARING FOR DAY OF LOVE

Area florists, restaurants ready for Friday's influx of Valentine's Day consumers

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As lovebirds fly around town trying to find the perfect gift or plan the perfect evening for Valentine's Day, area businesses are preparing to handle the holiday rush.

Connie Lee, owner of Kistner's Flowers and Greenhouses, said ordering extra flowers and supplies is the most difficult part of planning for Valentine's Day.

"It's probably the biggest single day of the year," Lee said.

Being as prepared as possible is the key to getting through the holiday successfully, said Lee, who is preparing for her 29th Valentine's Day in the floral business.

To prepare, Lee has lined up family and friends to work with her regular staff, rented vans, made a delivery list, typed up cards and ordered extra vases, flowers and balloons.

"You have no idea what it takes," she said. "But it's a lot of fun."

While the average consumer might not know what it takes to prepare for such a rush, other Manhattan businesses do.

Dinner is a big part of many couples' Valentine's Day plans, and providing good service is important to pleasing customers, said Andrew Wheeler, assistant manager of Gold Fork Casual Foods and Spirits.

Gold Fork also receives supplies early, Wheeler said, getting its order on Thursday rather than Friday so the employees can be sure to have everything stocked.

In addition, Wheeler said, the staff is being bulked up to two or three times the normal staff. Most of the wait staff experienced the Valentine's Day rush last year, Wheeler said, but many new employees will have to learn on their feet.

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN
Connie Lee, owner of Kistner's Flowers and Greenhouses, takes down a phone order for Valentine's Day while working on a vase full of spray roses on Wednesday.

In fact, he said, it will be difficult for everyone because Valentine's Day is on a Friday, which will mean even more people will be dining out.

"It's hard to prepare for it," Wheeler said. "It's rough because you can't do anything until it hits."

Despite the frustration of waiting, experience tells Wheeler that the evening will be enjoyable for customers and employees alike.

"It's a fun atmosphere," he said. "There are lots of people around."

However, some couples might want to avoid the crowds. For those planning on picking up a gift and spending the evening at home, the Manhattan Town Center provides a wide variety of shopping options, marketing director Randy Crow said.

"You can stroll through the mall and see the special promotions the stores are offering," Crow said. "This is one of the major holidays on our yearly calendar."

Crow said the mall's stores have put up holiday decorations, and just walking through and seeing the different approaches to decorating can be fun in itself.

But the mall isn't just focusing on the holiday, he said. For those not interested in celebrating Valentine's Day, Crow said the mall has displays set up for women's basketball and the junior rodeo.

"We've got so many things going on right now," he said, "and we're squeezing Valentine's Day in the middle of all that."

While local businesses plan and prepare for Friday's rush, Crow said it's important for the consumers to be prepared for the holiday as well.

"Especially to you guys out there," he said, "don't forget to get her a gift. Don't come in the day after because you forgot to get her something."

Five last-minute gifts

It's the day before Valentine's Day and you still don't have a gift. Manhattan business owners said what they think makes the perfect last-minute gift for your Valentine.

Flowers
"They are something easy to buy, and everybody loves them. You don't have to know a size or a color, really. It works for men or women, old or young. It's the perfect gift. If you are at a loss for words, they work great. Valentine's Day is the biggest holiday."
— Karen Medlin, owner of Westloop Floral

Chocolate
"It's real easy and convenient. We make premade gifts for last-minute people. You can show your affection that way."
— Melissa Power, manager of Candyopolis

Cologne/Perfume
"It makes a wonderful gift anytime because some people are known for signature scents. It's very romantic and very personal. Someone who is giving you a fragrance is very personal. Fragrances are just the best ideal gifts."
— Betti Jones, Dillards sales associate

Dinner
"It's a good time for people to sit and talk and get to know each other. It makes it more special than monetary gifts. Our busiest day of the year tends to be Valentine's Day. Every couple in town wants to go out to eat."
— Miranda Smith, bar manager of Applebee's Neighborhood Bar and Grill

Jewelry
"It's almost always the perfect gift. It's just the perfect gift, particulary from a young man to a young woman."

'Private Eyes' spreads light on human deceit with love story

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Saying the play "Private Eyes," is straightforward is a flat out lie.

That is because "Private Eyes," written by Steven Dietz, is a student-run and designed play that is based on lies and deceit. The play, opening tonight, takes a humorous and serious look at the human act of lying, said Kate Anderson, associate professor and director of theater.

Private Eyes
When: 8 p.m., Feb. 13-15, 19-22
Where: Nichols Theatre
Tickets: $10 for adults, $6 for students and seniors. For reservations call McCain box office at 532-6428.

"[It's] a love story that involves mystery and suspense," Anderson said. "It is about deception, and that makes it a very surprising play. It makes the audience think about what's an illusion and what's real, and that's why I like it."

Anderson said she really likes the play because it is intriguing, funny and serious all at once. She said the cast and crew were able to take some artistic liberties with the play.

Matt Elliott | COLLEGIAN
During dress rehearsal of Private Eyes in Nichols Auditorium, Debbie Swann, freshman in theater, who plays Cory, places a birthday hat on Matt McCann, sophomore in theater, who plays Matthew, as Garrett Gottschalk, senior in theater, who plays Adrian, and Trista Lee Stone, freshman in fine arts, who plays Lisa, wait impatiently.

"We were able to make music and dance a part of the show," Anderson said. "It is a very exciting script. We were able to do neat things with the lighting, costumes and set design."

In the play, Matt (played by Matt McCann, sophomore in theater) is faced with his wife's affair. The audience is led to believe that perhaps Matt has a mental condition when he has difficulty recalling what has occurred in his past.

The plot twists and turns as characters are revealed to not be exactly who they appear to be. Maintaining composure while representing three different characters can be difficult, but entertaining, McCann said.

"The biggest challenge was, I have to live as three characters and then find the nuances between them," McCann said. "But because of that, it will keep you on your toes wondering what's going on. At the very least it will be a conversation piece afterwards when you go, 'What just happened?'"

He said everyone will take something away from the play because it resembles how people act in life.

"No one ever really tells everyone the truth," McCann said. "And the play makes us think 'Where do we draw the line between it all?'

"But, Kate (Anderson) rocks. She's let us explore so much artistically, and that has helped to make it a great first experience."

Acting wasn't the only challenge in trying to deceive the audience. Designing the set for a script that demands confusion and deception can be tricky, Reuben Lucas, senior in theater, said.

"When you read the script itself, you don't know the truth until the end," Lucas said.

"I think the Matt character helped to sum it up best," Anderson said. "'The most important moment in a relationship is when you strip it down and there's two people looking into each others' eyes and not running.'"

CALENDAR

Mother Kali will perform at 9:30 tonight at Pat's Blue Rib'n Barbecue.

Private Eyes is showing at 8 tonight at Nichols Theatre.

Mark Selby will perform tonight at Silverado Saloon in Aggieville.

Surviving Grateful Dead members change name

The surviving members of the Grateful Dead, who retired the group's name and dubbed themselves The Other Ones after the death of leader Jerry Garcia, have decided to rename themselves The Dead.

Bassist Phil Lesh, guitarist Bob Weir and drummers Bill Kreutzman and Mickey Hart will inaugurate their new name at a Valentine's Day benefit concert in San Francisco.

during the first half, pitched in 11 in the second to post a game-high 16, and Ohlde doubled her halftime tally to finish with 14.

"I'm just kind of frustrated with my shot a little bit, but I can't let that get to me," Wecker said. "I tried to distribute the ball a little tonight and just tried to calm down and be comfortable with my shot. It kind of came around in the second half, especially late in the game."

By that point, the outcome was only a formality.

Nebraska was plagued by a 30-percent first-half from the field and didn't have an answer for K-State's 48-percent shooting in the second, as the Wildcats swept the season series with the Huskers for the first time since 1995.

"I wanted to give a variety of combinations a look tonight to add an even greater challenge to our focus and our concentration," Patterson said.

"I was really pleased with our response to it."

versus Colorado, and 12 against the Cornhuskers in Lincoln before embarking on her most recent scoring binge.

Coach Deb Patterson said the loss of Laurie Koehn, who sat the first of five complete games this season Jan. 19 against Nebraska, has sometimes forced Mahoney to abandon her own game for the interests of the team.

"She's learning to maximize her performance while making others better," she said. "Those are multiple dimensions there, and for a while, Megan struggled a little bit with her own game while she tried to assume the responsibility for helping the people around her get better on the perimeter."

Patterson said Mahoney's acceptance of her new responsibilities, and the rest of the Wildcats' acceptance of their individual roles, has helped the sophomore's game grow.

"Now, as we are evolving and getting more steady play out of Amy (Dutmer), and as Chelsea (Domenico) becomes really dynamic in terms of her confidence level, it's allowed Megan to relax and feel the game," she said.

"She's got such great instincts that when she's not forcing action or feeling the burden to force action, whether it's her own shot or the next pass, she's very, very good."

CONCERN | U.N. agency reports North Korean obligations to council

matter," ElBaradei said, pledging to "make every effort to bring the DPRK into compliance." DPRK stands for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

"I hope we will see movement in the right direction," he said.

Russia and Cuba abstained from the vote, which sets the stage for possible sanctions against Pyongyang.

"We consider the sending of this question to the U.N. Security Council to be a premature and counterproductive step," Russia's representative said in a statement. Cuba called for a negotiated solution to the conflict and said there were still diplomatic options to exhaust.

China, which, like Russia, opposes sanctions and has veto power as a permanent Security Council member, urged all sides to exercise restraint and refrain from taking any actions that could escalate the issue.

But ElBaradei, who gave the board a report last month saying North Korea is not keeping its promises, made it clear that the IAEA had little choice after having been backed into a corner.

"The current situation sets a dangerous precedent," he said Wednesday.

North Korea has not met its obligations under international nuclear accords, the IAEA said, adding that it remains unable to verify that there has been no diversion of nuclear material for weapons use.

The IAEA urged the North to comply, but also said it stresses its desire for a peaceful resolution of the nuclear issue and its support for diplomatic means to that end.

In a statement, South Korea's representative called the action a direct and inevitable consequence of the North's withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

"North Korea's actions seriously endanger the peace and stability on the Korean peninsula and in the whole East Asian region. It also threatens to undermine the international non-proliferation regime," the South said. But it added that reporting the North to the council does not mean the end of diplomatic efforts.

At U.N. headquarters in New York, U.S. deputy ambassador Richard Williamson said Washington was pleased but added: "The United States first feels this can be dealt with diplomatically, and we're confident that we can resolve this issue diplomatically."

The crisis began in October, when U.S. officials said North Korea had admitted having a nuclear weapons program in violation of a 1994 agreement.

The United States and its allies suspended oil shipments to the impoverished communist country. North Korea, in turn, expelled IAEA inspectors, disabled the agency's monitoring cameras, withdrew from a global nuclear arms-control treaty and said it would reactivate its main nuclear complex, frozen since 1994.

Formally reporting North Korea to the Security Council is a grave diplomatic step, opening the way for economic sanctions or other punitive measures against the country. But it was unclear whether the council would support such action, which Pyongyang has made clear it would regard as an act of war.

SHANK | Big 12 won't follow through with Nebraska governor's plan

Dennis Franchione a whopping $2.2 million a year.

So, sorry, Huskers, it looks like even if Nebraska's anti-democratic, unicameral legislature approves the bill, it won't be able to be implemented anytime soon.

In other desperate measures to revive the program, the Nebraska athletic department announced football season ticket prices would be lowered this year. Apparently, they were worried about a dropoff in attendance. When K-State faced a similar scenario after the 6-6 2001 campaign, Athletic Director Tim Weiser implemented a plan requiring donations for most season ticket plans.

Last but not least, Nebraska also announced the team would be returning to its traditional uniforms this season. I guess many people associate last year's horrific season with those horrible Adidas-designed uniforms.

The Husker faithful seem to believe making tickets cheaper, firing a couple of longtime assistants and bringing back old uniforms will put the team back on track for 2003.

I highly doubt these changes will really make a difference.

Hey, but look on the bright side: At least K-Staters will be able to spend less this year to see the Cats beat Nebraska in Lincoln.

days their schedules allow.

To help fill vacancies when the college students have class, Philp said there are parents and para-educators that help in the lunchroom and on the playground.

"You have your good days and your bad days," said Loretta Kordyak, mother of five children and playground assistant. Kordyak has been working on the playground at Northview since August, and she said she enjoys the opportunity to see her two school-age children during the day.

"I always get a big, running hug," she said. "The first thing I ask them is how their day is going."

Kordyak said having new supervisors can create some problems on the playground. She said the children try to get away with breaking rules because some of the newer supervisors might not know all the rules.

"I try to watch out for other supervisors," Kordyak said. "I want to support them without being overbearing."

Taylor said she was told to expect some misbehavior until the children got used to having new faces around. She and Cook both started Monday, so they have to relearn the playground rules.

"I just stand around and reminisce my days of playing four-square," Cook said. "It makes you feel younger."

While Cook said he sees a lot of similarities to his elementary school days, Taylor said she was surprised at how forward her new admirer was.

"I figured he'd think I had cooties," she said.

Befort said. "They don't make you work certain hours and are very flexible."

Jay Reynard, HVAC shop supervisor, has nine students employed. He hires the majority of workers after breaks. When hiring, Reynard said he does not look for previous experience and gives anyone a chance. However, he said he makes sure his workers look appropriate on the job.

"I require students to look nice and behave themselves because they are representing us on campus," Reynard said.

Reynard said the job is very flexible.

Some students work as many as 20 hours each week, and others work as few as six.

"I try to work the day into four time slots," Reynard said.

"This way, students can usually find a couple hours to work."

Hothan the job isn't stressful.

"The guys are cool, and we have a lot in common," Hothan said. "Sometimes we have tight situations, but it's fun and not too hard work."

Befort said he agreed that the job offers many advantages.

"It is a basic job, and it is nice that it is on campus," Befort said. "There is nothing bad about the job, and they accommodate you well."

While pulling air conditioners from a building could get boring after a while, the workers find ways to enjoy the job.

"We all goof off and make the job fun by playing jokes on each other," Befort said.

"I once saw a co-worker spill a bucket of oil on himself."

production in the U.S. for the total country," said Marc Johnson, dean of the College of Agriculture.

"If someone wanted to affect the meat supply of the nation, this would be the place to come."

Johnson said bioterrorism in livestock would be harmful to the food supply.

"It is devastating to producers because when you get an outbreak of a disease, the livestock has to be destroyed," he said.

"It is extremely disturbing to markets because the consumer confidence and export potential plummets when an unusual disease attacks food animals."

Teagarden said the warning will help livestock owners be aware of possible threats of bioterrorism.

lot from really experienced horsemen."

That experience has paid off for the Lee's Summit, Mo., product.

While having only about 10 practices under her belt at K-State, Peery helped to lead the No. 1 Western team in the nation to two resounding victories.

She said she was nervous about how her new teammates would accept her, though.

"I was a bit worried, but it's gone really well," Peery said. "They've all been really nice. I finally got to meet a lot of the girls on the team (at the show), and they all welcomed me."

Teamwork, Peery said, is of the utmost importance for the remainder of the season.

"We have really good girls," she said. "Our coach has a lot of knowledge and makes us work really hard."

That said, the K-State Western team now turns its attention to the postseason. With a commanding lead in its region, K-State appears poised to send its first team to the national competition.

"We're very excited," Breidenthal said. "We're already planning on going, deciding who we're going to take. One of my goals as a coach last year and this year is to go to nationals."

While Peery might have the opportunity to ride for K-State at nationals as part of a five-rider team, she won't have the chance to be one of more than 20 K-State riders advancing to the postseason individually.

By transferring at the semester, there aren't enough shows for Peery to earn enough points to qualify.

That doesn't dampen Peery's spirits, though.

"I'm just really excited," she said. "I think in the years to come, we'll just get better and better."

Military students defer loans

Law protects soldiers from interest build-up

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Military students being called to active duty will leave more than semester classes and friends behind – they'll leave student debt.

Brynn McFarlane, assistant director of financial aid, said students called to active duty can defer student loans during their time away from school. However, the majority of students in the military don't know this service exists, he said.

"Any student being called to active duty would be able to benefit from this, but they have to contact the appropriate people – that's the key," McFarlane said.

McFarlane said a new law, enacted after Sept. 11 2001, protects students from interest build-up during active duty, but there are certain requirements.

"It's important that students being called to active duty come to the office and let us know," she said. "If they don't, and they come across a withdrawal list, we don't know the circumstances."

Without notifying the financial aid office, no one will know if the student is serving overseas or just dropped out of school, she said. Students who are overseas could compile interest on loans without knowing it and eventually go into default.

Senators meet with representatives, voice budget concerns

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The involvement of seven student senators at State Education Day was commended at Thursday night's Student Senate meeting.

Governmental Relations Chair Julie Quackenbush, along with six other Senate members, traveled to Topeka Feb. 11 to speak with state legislators about higher education issues and concerns.

The day, Quackenbush said, was a success.

"I think the general consensus was good," Quackenbush said.

"It was a productive day for us. We learned quite a bit."

Quackenbush said K-State, along with other Kansas Board of Regents universities across the state, spoke with at least 173 Kansas representatives.

"Overall, there was a pretty positive consensus from them," she said.

As far as budget cuts, Quackenbush said legislators told those students in attendance that colleges would Manhattan residents practice their swing-dancing skills Tuesday at Manhattan Town Center.

Students, community learn dancing skills

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The crowds gathered in the Manhattan Town Center Tuesday night, but not to shop.

Instead, people crowded around a makeshift dance floor to watch couples from the community learn how to swing dance.

"Our goal is to dance with the woman in such a way that she will want to dance with you again," dance instructor Mike Salerno said to his group of dance students.

The six-week swing dance class is free to the public, and about 90 to 100 people take advantage of the lessons every week.

Dance lessons

Dance instructor Mike Salerno teaches swing-dance lessons every Tuesday night at the Manhattan Town Center food court from 6:30 to 7:30 p.m. Lessons are free and continue through March 11.

"I like the way swing dance looks, and it's cool that the lessons are free," D'Ann Wadsworth, junior in industrial engineering, said.

Wadsworth and her partner, Baron Stout, senior in accounting, were one of the couples participating in the class that were K-State students, a trend that Salerno said is common.

"Probably 75 percent of the participants are mid-20s and younger," Salerno said. "People always want to dance and this gives them a venue to do it for free and learn something new."

Alex Reisenweber, senior in horticulture, and his girlfriend, Malydia Finke, senior in education, practice swing dancing.

Salerno said the benefits of dancing, depending on the type, can be positive for a lifetime.

Cara Shufelberger, freshman in secondary education, started her second week by running on the track at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One week down, five to go.

Cara Shufelberger, freshman in secondary education, is enjoying her lifestyle change after completing her first week of the Wellness Resource Center's Spring Break Training Program.

"Sometimes, when I have a lot of stuff to do, it's kind of a pain, but it's mostly not too big of a deal," she said. "It's usually pretty easy to find time for it."

Shufelberger is changing her eating and exercise routine in hopes of becoming more physically fit.

But some changes are more difficult than others.

"Actually, eating every two hours is weird," she said. "I'm not used to eating that often and making sure I'm eating everything I need."

Shufelberger also said she didn't like writing down everything she ate during Sunday, Monday and Tuesday.

However, fitness consultants Tiffany Bullard, junior in nutrition and exercise, and Stephanie Caouette, senior in kinesiology, said Shufelberger is doing great.

"She was doing really well," Bullard

Tyson Behunin, freshman in biology, and Tyson Smith, sophomore in psychology, spend their Tuesday evening playing video games in their bedroom at the Delta Sigma Phi fraternity house.

Studying a priority over video games

By Jessica Packard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Video games can be consuming, even addictive, but students know need to know how to say "no" and keep their play time under control.

Jason Smith, sophomore in psychology, said that although he enjoys playing video games, he has priorities that come first.

"Video games are fun, and when I play them I can get away from reality.

"It's something I enjoy," Smith said.

"But I won't let a video game get in the way of school work."

Joe Brown, sophomore in biology, said games can be beneficial in bonding with friends.

"There is a lot of teamwork involved when you play in a group, and it teaches you to work with people," Brown said.

Students living in Haymaker Hall can participate in organized video-game tournaments.

Jacob Schuler, Haymaker sixth-floor resident assistant, assists in coordinating these tournaments with the sponsor, E.A. Sports.

Campus Connection

Many of the issues that affect K-State also affect other universities around the nation. Read each week about an issue that relates to K-State and another campus.

Schuler said students participate in these tournaments as a way to relieve stress.

Mark Barnett, professor in psychology, said video games are not harmful, but those with vulnerabilities can be affected.

"It doesn't cause psychological problems but if there are other things like shyness, awkward or aggressive behaviors, then video games can hinder the social aspect," Barnett said.

Lia Boediman, psychology intern for Lafene Counseling Services, said video games could be addictive and a problem for participants in separating the game from reality.

"It can be hard separating what is real and what is not," Boediman said.

Video games help students escape

By Kevin Wiggs
UNIVERSITY DAILY KANSAN

LAWRENCE, Kan. - Some students smoke, drink or exercise to calm nerves after a long day, but others flip the switch on a game console and lock themselves into a fantasy world.

Psychology experts say these games can do more harm than good.

Some people find themselves spending too much time in front of their Game Cubes.

Francis DeSalvo, director of Counseling and Psychological Services at Watkins Memorial Health Center, said shy people are more susceptible to becoming obsessed because they use it to escape their problems.

"They are generally uncomfortable around people so they lock themselves into a game that they can have total control over," DeSalvo said.

Kevin Green, Kansas City, Kan., resident, dropped out of KU partly because of "EverQuest," a computer game played on the Internet.

"I spent at least 60 hours a week on the computer, and that was probably a slow week," Green said.

"When you're in a game, there are about 2,000 others in the same area playing with you," he said. "We are constantly talking and get to know each other well."

DeSalvo said there is treatment for game addicts.

"We would try to put something more functional in the game's place, or teach them some coping mechanisms so the next time they have a problem they can deal with it," DeSalvo said.

Karimi, Kyner enter race

Pair files to run for president, vice president

Kelly Glasscock | COLLEGIAN

Jared Kyner, junior in pre-medicine and nutrition sciences, and Ali Karimi, senior in economics, are running for student body vice president and president. Primary elections are Feb. 25 and 26.

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ali Karimi and Jared Kyner want to make a difference.

Karimi, senior in economics, and Kyner, junior in premed and nutrition sciences, are running for student body president and vice president, and they want to make changes students will notice right away.

"This campaign came about out of necessity," Karimi said. "We have some issues people have never heard of."

Karimi and Kyner have four platforms they are running on, which they call the "Big Four."

"These are things, when enacted, that you'll notice them immediately and appreciate them," Karimi said.

The first of the Big Four is for K-State to extend its deadline to drop classes until the week of finals, a model after Stanford University.

The second is to get rid of 7:30 a.m. finals and classes.

Karimi said that as an economics major, has had a number of classes and finals at the early time.

Their third platform issue is to speed up the SafeRide program implementation, a program that would offer a school-sponsored designated driver.

"They're moving at a snail's pace," Karimi said. "It hasn't even been enacted, and we just want to see it being put into place. The wheels are turning for it, but we want to see it done."

Kyner said the program would benefit all students by making the roads safer with fewer drunken drivers.

The team's fourth platform includes more options for students to exchange textbooks.

"We'd like to have a book exchange expanded online, but also to have a student-to-student book swap fair like they have fairs at the beginning and end of the semesters," Karimi said.

Kyner said he feels a need to give back to K-State for all it has provided him.

"I feel the objectives Ali and I want to accomplish are changes K-State has needed for a while," he said.

"Some of our platform issues are things that have been talked about in previous years that haven't really been accomplished."

If elected, Karimi said all of his issues could be accomplished within the span of an academic year.

"I'm the type of person who likes to set goals and then accomplish them," Karimi said. "And within the scope of the year and those four big issues, we could easily get them all done."

Kyner agreed.

"They're actual plans for things rather than just vague statements," he said.

"I know you need to be careful not to promise something you can't accomplish, but our plans are obtainable within a year."

Aggieville's slogan-contest winner chosen out of hundreds of entries

Student wins prizes for submitting tradition-themed phrase

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Aggieville Business Association announced the winner of its slogan-writing contest Thursday after sorting through hundreds of entries.

Tori Dahm, senior in elementary education, won $700 in prizes for submitting the winning slogan, "Aggieville ... 100 years, 100 shops, live the tradition."

Dahm said she was in class Wednesday when she got the call that she had won.

"I was very surprised because I'm sure there were so many entries," Dahm said.

"I never thought that I would be the one to be chosen."

Cheryl Sieben, director of the ABA, said the contest committee chose the entry for its versatility from seven other finalists.

"We can do a lot of things with this," Sieben said.

"It's a real versatile slogan because if a business owner wanted to make it fit for their particular business, whether it was a salon, clothing store, or bookstore, they could."

Sieben said business owners can personalize the slogan by adding 100 books, 100 cups of coffee, 100 CDs or whatever the business sold.

"The tradition part of the slogan was also very important," she said.

"We wanted them to know about shopping in Aggieville – that was real important to this committee."

The committee, made up of Aggieville retailers, chose 23 entries after several meetings. Members then voted on their favorite and chose seven finalists, from which the retail committee chose Dahm's entry .

"We didn't expect this kind of a response," Sieben said.

"There was no clear cut, jump-out-at-you winner, because there were so many good ones, but the purpose of the contest was to tell us the total shopping experience of Aggieville, so we tried to zero in on that."

Sieben said the committee did change Dahm's original entry.

"The original entry was, 'Aggieville ... 100 years, over 100 shops, the tradition continues,' but we actually fine-tuned it to fit what best represents Aggieville."

Dahm said she was pleased with the slight change.

"Actually, after I heard what it was, I loved it," she said.

"I'm very happy with that, and I don't care. They just modified it a little bit, and they did a great job doing that."

Sieben said the committee was pleased with the number of submissions for the contest.

"We were inundated with e-mails and ideas from students, faculty and the community," she said.

"This is probably one of the best things we've done to get feedback from the community in a long time."

Some gave more feedback than others.

"One person submitted 31 ideas," Sieben said.

In addition, there may be a consolation prize in the works.

"We may try to reward or give some sort of thank you to the final contestants by the end of February," Sieben said. "We'll see if we can give them Aggie Bucks or gift certificates."

Dahm, however, will receive her prizes Monday.

"We'll definitely go out to eat. My fiance and I love all the restaurants there," she said.

"I don't really know yet what I'll do. I'm just going to kind of wait and see what all is in there."

But for Dahm, it is more than just gift certificates.

"It's just shocking," she said.

"Now every time I look at a sign in Aggieville, I'll be like, hey, that was my idea."

TO THE POINT

Editors share experiences with true love

How do we know it is true love?

Amy Preston: When I offer to pay, and he doesn't turn me down.

Tara Patty: When he does something stupid and you forgive him.

Kecia Seyb: When your stomach does that dip thing when he walks into the room after you've been dating for a year.

Dan Smith: When you can't stop thinking about her even when she's miles away.

Sarah Rice: When you think your heart will burst out of your chest with love, no matter what he does.

Dana Strongin: When he understands what I think, feel and need more than I will ever know, and he makes me smile.

Christopher Harrop: Living with the fact that your special someone is a veteran of the bondage fetish film industry, or a dirty construction worker.

Paul Restivo: Having children out of wedlock always adds a little spice, but the ultimate would have to be the moment we can fanny burp in front of each other.

My roommate had sex with a hermaphrodite. Does that make him gay?

What? Women's basketball in the DVD yearbook? I'm never buying a yearbook again.

The only athletes in NASCAR are the pit crew.

I was wondering what I should get my roommate's girlfriend for Valentine's Day.

Why is it the only time women's rights move forward, it's when we take our clothes off?

Were you the one who looked at me? Who smiled at me? Or were you the other one, who walked right on by?

I wish people would stop talking and take some action in bringing back Lorena Barboza's bilingual column.

Paul Restivo, you're right on. It's not called the one-eyed monster for nothing.

Kathryn, that was one of the best articles I have read in the Collegian in a long time. Thanks.

Even if Paul Restivo shaved off all his pubic hair, nobody would be interested in seeing his tallywhacker flop around.

North Korea, come on and raise up. Take your shirt off and spin it 'round your head like a helicopter.

Finding an incredibly hot woman that likes dorky guys: priceless. Finding out later on that you're not a big enough dork for her: worthless.

Lost and found in the Derb: Lifestyle condom. Claim at the hot dog line.

I have a heart on.

If you were a hot dog, would you eat yourself? And if you were, would you spread mustard and ketchup all over you?

Hey, rowing boy. Show me your stroke.

I was just wondering if it was a coincidence that Valentine's Day and vagina both start with "V-A."

A WEAKENED NATO

World conflicts demonstrate struggles of organization, need for change

ANDREW LAWSON

The events of the past week have exerted critical stress on an already weakened NATO.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization was founded to counter the threat of the Soviet Union.

More than a decade after the collapse of the "Evil Empire," NATO is threatened by the "Axis of Evil."

But the U.S.S.R. loomed larger than the threat posed by rogue nations like Iraq and terrorist organizations such as al-Qaeda, at least in Europe's eyes.

It's amazing NATO has held together this long without the mission that necessitated its existence.

It has done so by redefining its role, concentrating more on integrating former members of the Soviet bloc.

The situation with Iraq, though, prompts me to wonder if perhaps redefinition is enough.

What NATO needs is a complete overhaul, including, but not limited to, the ejection of certain members that contribute nothing but criticism and discontent.

I am talking about France, Germany and Belgium.

These countries are doing everything in their power to impede the United States in dealing with Saddam Hussein.

Since talk of forced regime change began, France has opposed any war.

Recently, Germany and Belgium have sided with the French.

Last week, they proposed a compromise alternative – U.N. occupation troops, 200 additional weapons inspectors and a no-fly zone over all of Iraq.

Despite the reasonable-sounding nature of the plan, President Bush and Secretary of State Colin Powell painted it as just another stall tactic.

They were proven right when France, Germany and Belgium objected to defending Turkey against attack in the event of conflict with Iraq.

Turkey, as a NATO member, is well within its rights to request defensive aid, but the trio of dissenters think deploying troops in Turkey would lock NATO into a course of war.

Bush has pledged that America will stand by Turkey, regardless of NATO's stance on the issue.

If the three countries continue to hold out, though, NATO may as well be dissolved.

Its primary purpose is the mutual defense of its member nations, after all.

If France, Germany and Belgium want to disagree with American policy in the United Nations, fine.

That is the forum for debating courses of action.

NATO, on the other hand, is all about solidarity.

There can be no disagreement between members, or they are no longer mutual allies.

American legislators seem to be leaning toward this stance.

Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., said, "America has fought distant wars to defend whole continents from a succession of aggressors, but the beneficiaries of the safety we have ensured often devote their energies to impeding our efforts to help others."

Rep. Tom Lantos, D-Calif., was even more outspoken, saying he was "particularly disgusted by the blind intransigence and utter ingratitude" of the three nations.

"If it were not for the heroic efforts of America's military, France, Germany and Belgium today would be Soviet socialist republics," he said. "The failure of these three states to honor their commitments is beneath contempt."

Unfortunately, some senators see no outcome but the dissolution of NATO. Sen. Joseph Biden, D.-Del., spoke of the inevitable atrophy of NATO if America acts alone to defend Turkey. Sen. John Warner, R-Va., proposed reducing NATO's funding.

These actions should not be necessary.

If the problem only revolves around France, Germany and Belgium, and they refuse to discharge their duties like they said they would when they signed up, then they should be ejected.

As the saying goes, with friends like these, who needs enemies?

With any luck, that drastic option will not be the only option. There is still time for the leaders of the three countries to come to their senses and stand with their allies.

If they persist, though, I firmly believe the only way to stop the gangrene creeping into NATO is to cut off the affected parts.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Columnist perpetuates gender inequality by using distorted viewpoint

Editor,

I am writing in response to Paul Restivo's column "Body-part exposure part of gender inequality." Paul has an extremely distorted view as to what gender inequality is all about.

Gender inequality is more than just "one homogeneous phenomenon, but a collection of disparate and interlinked problems."

These include, but are not limited to, professional inequality, ownership inequality and household inequality.

Restivo generalizes these issues to the fact that it is deemed acceptable for women to expose themselves where as men are not. This is not a gender inequality issue.

Restivo does not realize that the videos he is having a problem with are indeed a problem, a problem that is directly related to the cause and continuation for gender inequality.

They are designed for a male audience and promote the degradation of women.

The reason they do not have videos such as "Fraternity Boys Exposing Everything!" is because women in our society are not programmed to look at men in demeaning and objectifying ways.

If "Fraternity Boys Exposing Everything!" is a step up the ladder of gender equality, then Paul has a confused notion of what direction "up" is.

All those videos do is ensure that women are viewed as objects, not as people, denying their humanity and equality.

Paul also claims there is only so much he can do to be sexy, and that any more, and he will be considered homosexual.

He asserts that this "dilemma" of being sexy without being homosexual is one that men face every day.

Paul implicitly implies that this is directly correlated to the higher suicide rate in males.

Although men do have a higher rate of suicide, women lead men 2-to-1 in suicide attempts.

This is much more telling. Women attempt suicide more in order to escape the sadistic and misogynistic physical and emotional abuse suffered at the hands of men.

I am also curious who looks down upon a stay-at-home father and thinks that a stay-at-home mother is "cute," if you're upper-middle class and white.

If you're a minority and poor, then you're seen as lazy, "a welfare mother" if you will.

I, for one, have immense respect for any person that gives up their professional career to take care of their children, regardless of their gender.

It is attitudes like those had by Restivo that make it difficult for people to make that choice.

The walls of gender inequality should be dismantled.

They surround our life and make it impossible for us to break free.

The misogynistic beliefs held by Restivo and those like him are adding bricks to the wall, entrapping us even further.

Men and women are not equal, not intrinsically but by the repressive forces that have made it that way.

Paul, you are not being discriminated because you do not have "boobies," but rather because society has programmed us to look at women in debasing ways rather than men.

The problem is not whether both genders should be "allowed" to show their skin, but that either is "allowed" to in the first place.

Try opening your eyes to the way the world actually works and make a useful contribution to it. In her editorial, Elisha O'Neal said, "If ignorance is bliss, Paul is living the good life."

He may be living the good life, but Martin Luther King Jr. once said "nothing in the world is more dangerous than a sincere ignorance and conscientious stupidity." Ignorance is curable, stupidity is not.

Students to compete tonight for blind date in 'Singled Out' game show

By Tristan Hinderliter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students without a Valentine's Day date will have somewhere to go tonight.

The Union Program Council is sponsoring a game show version of "Singled Out" as part of its Friday night After Hours activities. The contest begins at 9:30 p.m. in the Union Courtyard.

Members of the audience will compete for a date with two candidates – Matthew Painter, senior in criminology, and Tracy O'Halloran, junior in apparel design.

Samantha Musil, After Hours event coordinator and graduate student in public administration, said she had 27 applications to choose from when selecting the two featured students.

"They stood out in their interview when I called them back and asked them questions," Musil said. "They were both outgoing, friendly and very easy to get along with."

Painter described himself as "successfully single." Does he expect to find true love tonight?

"Not at all," he said.

He said he and several of his Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity brothers filled out the application, and he just got lucky.

"It's just something to do on Valentine's Day," he said.

Painter said he is excited about the event and that a lot of his friends will be there to cheer him on.

He said he is looking for a smart, athletic girl.

"She also needs to be clever and quick-witted," he said. "And, as cheesy as it sounds, I think she needs to make me want to be a better person, to improve myself – to inspire me."

Painter plays intramural basketball and is active on campus as a member of several university clubs, a favorite of which is GAMMA – Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol.

Female candidate O'Halloran doesn't have illusions of finding true love, either.

"I just filled out the application kind of jokingly," she said. "I was just like, 'all right, that'll be fun!'"

O'Halloran is a K-State cheerleader, so she said she's used to being in front of crowds, and she's excited about tonight's contest. She is also a member of Alpha Delta Pi sorority and Fellowship of Christian Athletes.

Musil said this is the first year the UPC is sponsoring "Singled Out," and that she hopes it will be a fun activity for single students on Valentine's Day.

The winning couples will be picked up by a limo and treated to a chaperoned, all-expenses-paid date including dinner, a show or movie, and bowling or pool.

Tennis team hopes to continue win streak

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Off to it's best start since 1989, No. 57 K-State will look to keep its three-match winning streak alive when it welcomes Utah to the Cottonwood Racquet Center at 1 p.m. Saturday.

Coming off a resounding 7-0 defeat of Wichita State last Saturday, the Cats will look to continue their recent success against the Utes. The last time the teams met, K-State dominated, scoring a 7-0 shutout in Manhattan during the 2001 season.

After Saturday's match, Coach Steve Bietau said he was really impressed with the singles play so far this season.

"Overall, I was really pleased with singles," Bietau said. "We didn't play well in doubles, and we played just well enough to squeak by in some matches. Our singles players looked like they had something to prove and did a good job taking care of business."

The top three singles players for the Cats have opened the season with 3-0 records. Senior Petra Sedlmajerova, sophomore Maria Rosenberg and freshman Jessica Simosa enter Saturday's match undefeated, and Sedlmajerova claims a five-match winning streak.

Besides Utah, the Cats are also focusing on another opponent: sickness. Bietau said several members of the team have been under the weather, so the week off will give them a chance to get some much-needed rest.

"Our biggest concern is getting people healthy," Bietau said. "We've been dealing with sinus infections, flu-like symptoms and various aches and pains. We've had players in and out of practice this week. We want to use this time as a breather and get fresh and ready to go this weekend."

Sedlmajerova is among the afflicted. Despite her illness, she managed to defeat Amanda Cervantes 4-6, 6-2 (6).

"Petra had the toughest opponent of anyone and was also sick at the time," Bietau said.

"Battling illness and playing against someone who has given us a tough time over the years, I thought she handled the situation really well."

Singles
1. Petra Sedlmajerova, KSU vs. Cassie Kasteler, Utah
2. Maria Rosenberg, KSU vs. Sheri Esrock, Utah
3. Jessica Simosa, KSU vs. Ellen Svensson, Utah
4. Paulina Castillejos, KSU vs. Rachel Alder, Utah
5. Andrea Cooper, KSU vs. Allison Hansen, Utah
6. Hayley McIver, KSU vs. Maria Svensson, Utah

Doubles
1. Sedlmajerova/Castillejos vs. Kasteler/E. Svensson
2. Cooper/Simosa vs. Esrock/Alder
3. McIver/Rosenberg vs. Hansen/M. Svensson

The Utes come to town with a record of 2-2 after a 6-1 loss to Brigham Young University on Saturday. The Cats opened their season with a 4-3 victory over the Cougars.

Cats welcome Western Illinois to open season

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

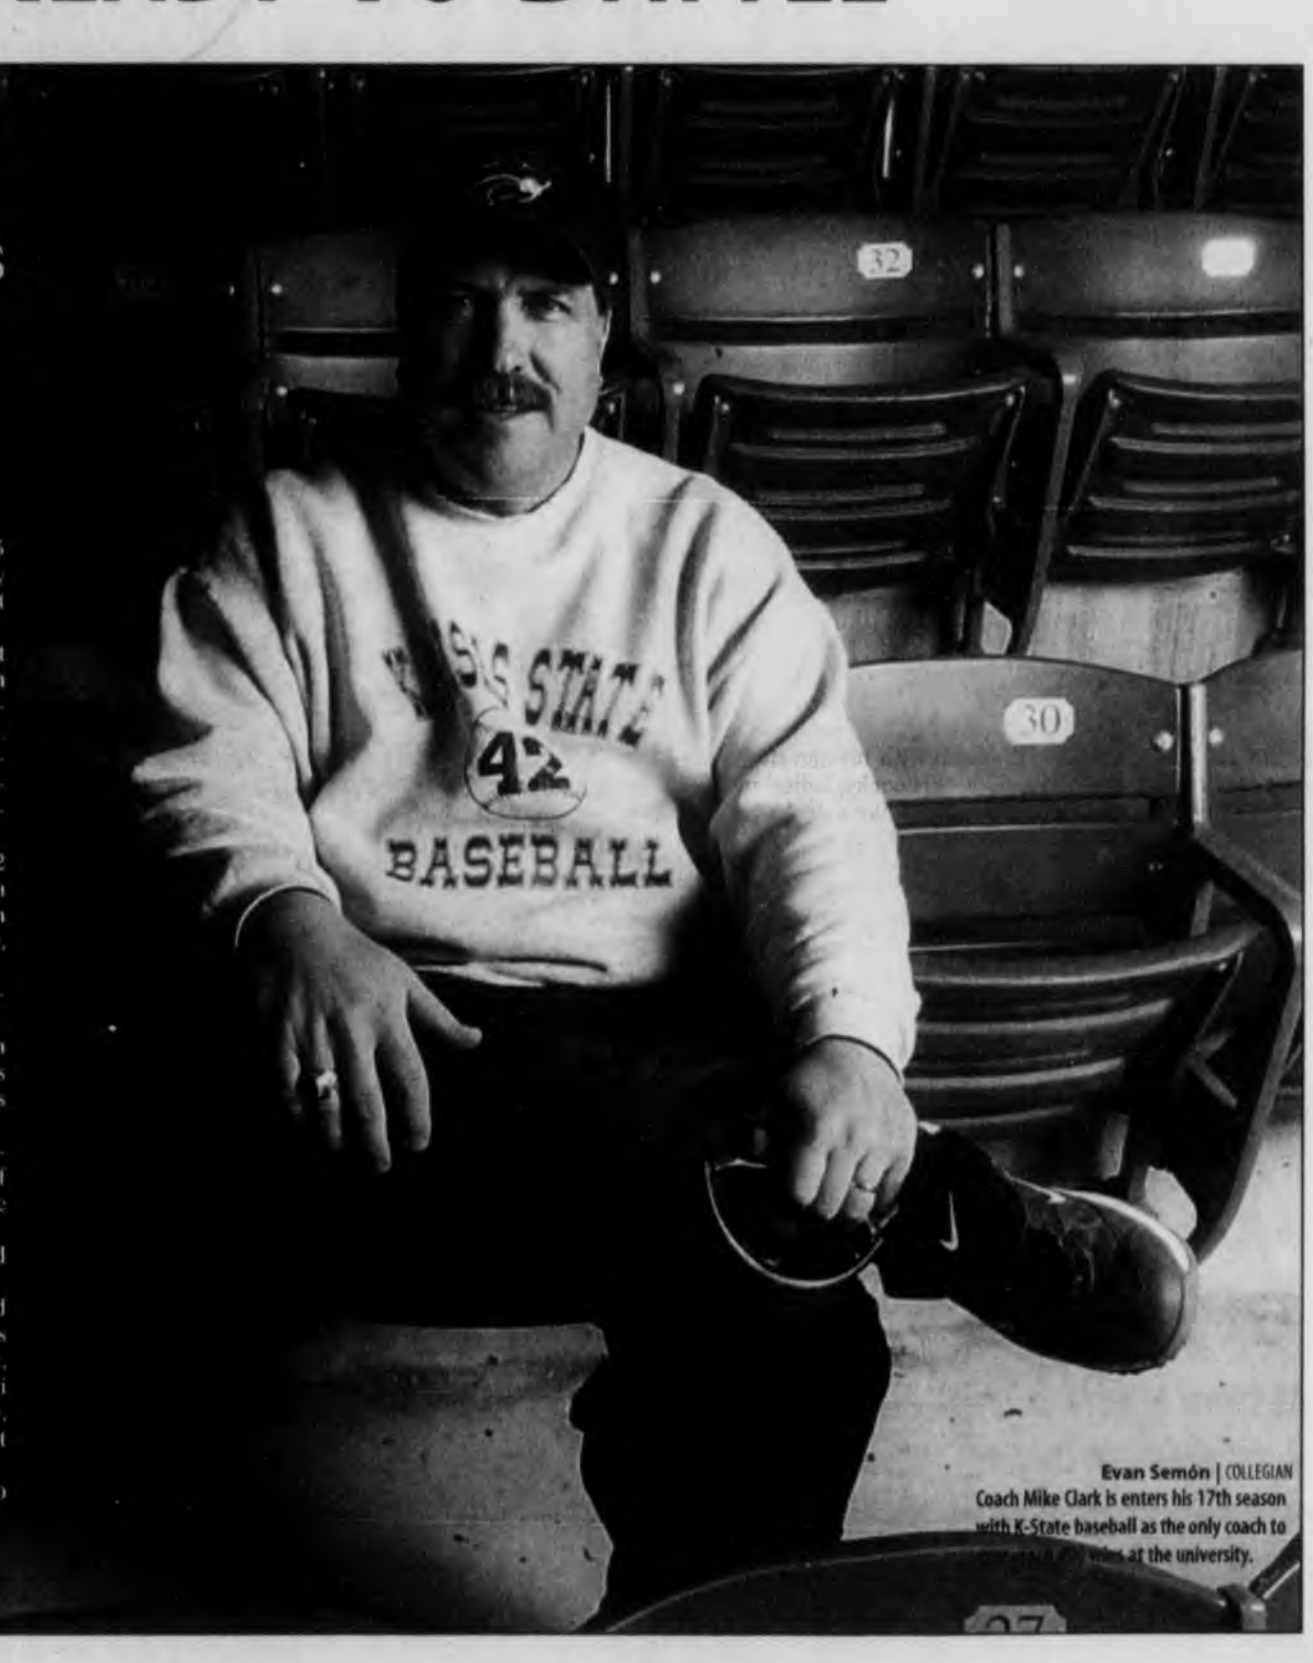
Mike Clark is approaching the 2003 baseball season differently from any other during his 17-year tenure at K-State.

This time last year, the Wildcat coach was giving what had become an annual speech addressing the elusiveness of a conference tournament bid. Five years had passed since the inception of the Big 12, and each season K-State finished the schedule empty-handed.

A year later, the Cats' first Big 12 Tournament appearance is barely a memory, and new priorities have been established for the program – namely, a date at the NCAA Tournament.

Last season, K-State nearly accomplished that step as well.

A schedule with too many Division II opponents and not enough games against teams with high power ratings kept the Cats on the outside, though.



To address those concerns, Clark injected K-State's schedule with a dose of strong competition to improve the Cats' chances this season.

"That's what this schedule is geared for," he said.

The D-2 opponents are gone, and K-State will play non-conference games against Arkansas, Florida Atlantic, Florida International, SE Missouri State, Washington and Wichita State, all of which are NCAA Tournament teams from a year ago.

Of course, a schedule can only go so

Wildcat men hope to stop Tigers' front-court advantage

Missouri gives Cats opportunity for road-trip victory

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Hearnes Center at the University of Missouri can be a tough place to play college basketball.

But when your team hasn't won a conference game on the road in nearly two years, it becomes even tougher.

That is the next challenge K-State (12-10, 3-6) faces when it meets the No. 21 Tigers (14-6, 5-4) on Saturday.

Coach Jim Wooldridge said that even though Missouri is coming off a 73-71 loss to Texas A&M on Wednesday, Columbia is always a difficult place to play.

"Our guys are excited about playing there," he said. "We know we're going to have to go play very well, but that's anywhere and everywhere in this league on the road.

"It's well-documented that we've had trouble on the road, but we're not going to let the past affect us," Wooldridge said. "We hope we're a better team, and we hope we'll put in good enough minutes to win the game."

K-State (12-10, 3-6) at No. 21 Missouri (14-6, 5-4)
When: 3 p.m. Saturday
Where: Hearnes Center (13,545) — Columbia, Mo.

Center Arthur Johnson has posed a matchup problem for teams this year, scoring in double figures in the Tigers' games.

Add to that the size of 6-foot-9 forward Travon Bryant, and Missouri's front court could give the Cats problems.

"Arthur is a threat down low," forward Matt Siebrandt said.

"He's a big, long kid that rebounds well, and he's got good touch around the hoop. He'll be a big challenge."

Johnson averages 16.8 points and 9.6 rebounds a game.

Siebrandt said that if there's a way to stop him, it's to keep him outside the paint.

"Just don't give him many angles. Keep him squared up and push him away from the hoop as far as possible," he said. "We have to try and limit his touches."

Another way to slow down Johnson is to get him into foul trouble, point guard Frank Richards said.

"It's really important that I look in to Matt and Pervis (Pasco) early on," he said.

"Try and attack Bryant and Johnson early on so they can get the feel for how the game is going to be called and played."

Richards played one of his better games Tuesday against Colorado, picking up eight assists and no turnovers.

But Richards has struggled shooting – the junior is just 1-of-20 in conference games from three-point range.

"My shot has been off a little bit," he said. "It's just a lack of confidence. I'm just trying to get more reps in and get back comfortable shooting the ball."

Wooldridge said instead of focusing on the negatives, Richards should focus on what else he does for the offense.

"Let's think about the positive side first," he said. "He had eight assists in the Colorado game. He's our primary ball handler, and he's setting other guys up. As he works himself through this and finds himself making more shots, it obviously would spread our offense out a little bit more. But you can't force-feed something.

"He's got to get comfortable, he's got to get his confidence, and most of his shots are good shots. Eventually, they'll fall for him."

Actors Fann Wong, Jackie Chan and Owen Wilson

NOON'S KNIGHTS

'Shanghai Knights' should entertain fans of its prequel

"SHANGHAI KNIGHTS"

Movie review by Wendy Gorman

"Shanghai Noon" fans have plenty of reasons to be happy.

The movie's sequel, "Shanghai Knights," not only stays true to the formula of the first movie, but it improves the finished product by tossing in bigger, cooler action scenes and smarter comedy.

The sequel pretty much picks up where "Shanghai Noon" left off, except Chon Wang (Jackie Chan) is holding reign over Carson City, Nevada, without Roy. He learns that his father, has been murdered and the Seal stolen. His sister, Chon Lin (Fann Wong), who witnessed the murder, has tracked the killer to London.

Wang heads to New York to find his old partner Roy O'Bannon (Owen Wilson), who has his share of the emperor's gold they secured in their last adventure. Of course, Roy ends up accompanying Wang to London to avenge the murder of Wang's father.

The plot isn't very intricate, but it doesn't matter. The lightning-quick fight scenes are enough to keep just about anyone interested. The movie has better visual effects, too, with one scene depicting Chan and Wilson bursting out of a flaming barn in a car.

Chan is in fine form, as always. The action sequences in "Knights" are even more inventive than those of "Noon," featuring improvisational weapons such as fresh produce, vases and even umbrellas. As Wang's sister (and Roy's object of lust), Fann Wong has some nice acrobatic displays of her own.

The writers have taken advantage of the setting of Victorian England to make the flick funnier. Many scenes take place at famous locations such as Scotland Yard, Buckingham Palace and Madame Tussaud's Wax Museum. The script also makes quirky references to a few famous people that will emerge from England, cashing in on the irony for several laughs.

The only drawback is the incongruity of the characters' dialogue. Wilson's one-liners are real keepers in this movie, and he knows how to deliver them effectively, but how often do you suppose people exclaimed "This country blows!" in Victorian England?

As wonderful as the action scenes may be, the success of the movie depends heavily on the chemistry between Chan and Wilson. They make a natural pair, Chan with his naivete and Wilson with his cocky, ladies' man demeanor. The two strike a perfect balance between off-the-charts energy and laid-back nonchalance, which makes "Knights" a pleasure to watch.

'Eva' no stroll through garden, has ridiculous plot, bad acting

"DELIVER US FROM EVA"

★½☆☆☆

Movie review by JJ Duncan

If you thought "Deliver Us From Eva" looked bad from the previews, it gets even worse when it lasts 100 minutes.

Combining bad acting, a ridiculous plot and a script plagued by cliches, the only redeeming factor is that its situational gags are occasionally funny.

The basic premise is good. Three guys are with three beautiful sisters who are under the thumb of the fourth and eldest sister who basically dictates their lives. That mean oldest sister is Eva, (Gabrielle Union, "The Brothers"), and she is making life hell for the three guys.

In a tight bind, the guys decide to get rid of Eva by paying master playa Ray Adams (LL Cool J) to seduce her, then get her to move away before dumping her.

It almost sounds Shakespearian. That is until you factor in some just plain ridiculous plot twists and horrible acting.

LL Cool J should take home a Razzie for his performance. First of all, he sounds like he's doing spoken word voice-overs for Marvin Gaye songs whenever he talks to Eva. I don't mean to hate on J, but a playa doesn't have to sound all breathy and dress like he's on the cover of a romance novel to get a tough girl.

The three sisters are just caricatures who play one emotion most of the time, and the three guys are the three faces of black comedy cliche. You've got the successful brotha in glasses, Tim (Mel Jackson), the blue collar brotha, Mike (Duane Martin, "The Groomsmen"), and the hood rat brotha, Darrell (Dartanyan Edmonds, "Woo").

It isn't the actors' faults, though. It looks like these cliches can be chalked up to black comedy writing and directing veteran Gary Hardwick ("The Brothers," "Trippin'," "Hangin with Mr. Cooper").

Hardwick seems to do black comedy written to sell to an ignorant white audience. Isn't that what "Hangin' with Mr. Cooper" was anyway? I know I was only 12 when it was on, but even then it felt fake.

As for those ridiculous plot twists, no matter how bad a movie is, I just can't bring myself to give away the end of a movie. But that doesn't mean it's worth sitting through.

For decent black comedy, you might just have to watch "Barbershop" again or wait until Kansas City native Eddie Griffin's stand-up movie, "Dys-funk-tional Family" comes out.

Nas' latest album proves he's a ruler

"GOD'S SON"

Album review by Matthew Webber

The real battle to rule New York doesn't occur in a Martin Scorsese film. It is fought in every new album Nas or Jay-Z drops.

Jay-Z lobbed two CD-shaped missiles in Nas' direction last year when he released the double album "The Blueprint 2." For Jigga it was merely flossing as usual, as he boasted about the usual ice, Cristal and the unbearable lightness of emceeing.

Nas, however, was rapping as if roused from a nap. He had one of the biggest hits of his career with 2001's Jigga-dissing "Ether."

The success of the accompanying album, "Stillmatic," indicated Nas was still as vital to the game as anyone. Here and on "The Lost Tapes," which he released in 2002, Nas sounded hungry again, as starving as his fans had been for an album as hot as his classic "Illmatic."

Nas released yet another album last year, "God's Son," on which he again tries to prove he rules the world.

The titles, lyrics and artwork suggest that not only is Nas the self-proclaimed "King of New York" – he's the King of the Jews! Like David Koresh or the German painter Albrecht Durer before him, Nas has a bit of a Messiah complex.

Sure, some of Jesus' parables were memorable (that prodigal son one's pretty dope), but he never flowed like this: "Thug girl who fly and talks so nicely/Put her in the coupe so she can feel the nice breeze/We could drive through the city no doubt/But don't say my car's topless/Say the titties is out."

Not only has Nas "Made You Look," he's made you rewind your CD.

Nas chooses his disciples poorly, as his requisite posse cut with the Bravehearts is one of the album's wacker tracks.

Most of the other songs, however, sound like they could be singles. The second single, "I Can," is Nas' message to the kids who sing the chorus: "I know I can/Be what I wanna be/If I work hard at it/I'll be where I wanna be." Flowing like a blend of the Drs. Dre and Seuss, Nas drops knowledge about African history and the perils of ghetto life.

Nas is still battling Jay-Z and all haters. Check the song titles: "Last Real N* Alive," "Mastermind," "Revolutionary Warfare" and "Warrior Song" (produced by Alicia Keys).

He also tells stories ("Get Down"), eulogizes his mother ("Dance"), duets with Tupac ("Thugz Mansion") and recites from an old notebook ("Book of Rhymes").

Nas rules New York, and by extension, America.

BASEBALL | Season to open

don't win 35 ballgames or more," Clark said, "but if we do, I want to make sure our ballclub has that opportunity to get to a regional. Now it's our responsibility to go out and win ballgames."

The nucleus of last year's squad returns to compete toward that goal, as K-State begins the season this weekend with a three-game set against Mid-Continent Conference foe Western Illinois.

"We have less questions than last year, but maybe more questions than I thought we'd have at this time," Clark said.

The biggest uncertainty is at shortstop.

Three players, newcomer Marc Chabot, and lettermen Brandon "Boogie" Taylor and Brett Williams, are battling for the spot.

"It's all about defense," he said. "I don't care if they hit a buck 10. We've got offense in the lineup, but we've got to consistently field ground balls and be able to throw."

All three will see time this weekend, but the team's deficiency at shortstop isn't consuming Clark.

In fact, the Wildcats have a depth of experience to draw from this season. First-team All-Big 12 selections Pat Maloney and Ty Soto will join All-Big 12 Honorable Mention selection Tim Doty to provide the Cats consistency at the plate.

"We have people back and a lot of incoming talent," Doty said. "We know what it takes. We were real close last year, but we didn't get over the hump. We think we can this year for sure."

K-State (0-0) vs. Western Illinois (1-1)

- Noon, Saturday (game one)
  RHP Jim Ripley, K-State vs. TBA
- 1 p.m., Saturday (game two)
  LHP Jared Bunn, K-State vs. TBA
- 1 p.m., Sunday
  RHP Kevin Melcher, K-State vs. TBA

Winning will be the Cats' primary objective, but K-State also is anxious to take the field against someone not wearing purple.

"We're definitely looking forward to it," Doty said. "We're getting tired of beating up on each other. It's time to play some other teams."

The Western Illinois series will test K-State's young pitching as well.

Eleven pitchers will suit up for the first time this weekend for the Cats, as Clark looks to rebuild his staff after losing nine pitchers from a year ago.

"There's enough arms there. It's time to play somebody and see if they get the other team out," Clark said.

With a Tuesday contest against Creighton bringing the Cats another early challenge, Clark said the staff should develop an identity quickly.

"It's put us in a little bit of a pitching cramp right off the bat," Clark said.

Regardless, Doty said K-State will be ready.

"We've been practicing every day for the last month," he said, "so as many games as we can play, the better."

DANCE | Students perfect swing-dancing skills during lessons

"I meet a lot of people, and it keeps me strong and healthy," he said. "Dancing provides lots of lifetime activity."

Lisa Kitten, freshman in mechanical engineering, and Brett Reiss, freshman in agricultural economics, participated in the class for the first time Tuesday night.

"It's a lot of fun, and it's also a good break from studying, so we we figured we could do it," Kitten said.

Salerno, who has been teaching dance for about 27 years, said he enjoys passing on his love of dancing to those he teaches.

"As you progress in dancing, you learn a lot of things, and you want to share them with everyone else," he said. "I have the knack of being able to pass along what I know in an educational way."

Salerno said the lessons are sponsored by the Picnic Place Merchants from the Town Center in an effort to bring people into the mall. Salerno teaches the lessons once a year and says he will continue to teach as long as they ask him back.

Although he only teaches one class a year in Manhattan, Salerno offers several lessons including Couples Variety Dancing, Latin Dancing and Line Dancing in Topeka and Lawrence, Kan.

"I know pretty much any kind of dance you want to do, and if I don't know how to do it, I'll go out and learn it," he said. "People seem to like the way I teach."

Kitten said her love for dance helped draw her into the swing dancing class.

"I've always wanted to do all kinds of dancing," she said.

SENATE | Senators meet with legislators, raise budget concerns probably be in a state of budget maintenance for the next year.

Governmental Relations Director David McCandless said that although most of the day was optimistic, there were some concerns.

"Most legislators and representatives were very supportive," he said. "They did express it would be a tough year, but they did say they wanted to maintain higher education. However, one representative raised some alarm."

McCandless said the representative expressed no problem in turning away those Kansas residents who would not be able to afford higher education.

Therefore, McCandless said it's important that students voice concerns to the state legislators.

"I think it's time we made voices heard," he said.

"It's not going to be an easy road. We could easily face 10 to 12 percent in cuts this year.

"A lot depends on how vocal we want them to be."

Student Senate

The following items were discussed at Thursday night's Student Senate meeting:

- A bill passed for the continuance of the Union Program Council Privilege Fee with a 49-0-0 vote
- A bill for the fiscal year 2003 Allocation to Ecumenical Campus Ministry passed with a 40-2-7 vote.
- A resolution to place smoking-policy questions on the spring 2003 election ballot passed unanimously.
- A bill for the fiscal year 2003 Allocation Muslim Student Association passed with a 42-1-2 vote.

MILITARY | Students need to contact loan lenders

McFarlane said a default status would hurt credit reports and possibly prevent students from getting a loan on a house or car.

Besides contacting the financial aid office, students need to contact lenders, she said.

"We're not the lender," McFarlane said. "Most students typically have federal direct loans. If they contact us, we give them the phone number and all the information necessary to contact the lender."

McFarlane said loans may be kept in a deferment period for as long as the student is on active duty, instead of the normal six-month grace period.

"They don't have to pay off the loan or any interest on it, either," she said. "That's an exception to a normal student who has withdrawn."

Also, students on active duty are often given a 100-percent tuition refund, McFarlane said.

Jeff Mann, senior in agronomy and Army ROTC member, said the tuition reimbursement program is helpful for military students.

"It's not a bad program," he said. "A lot of it depends on the unit you're assigned to. It's a good program."

McFarlane said students should also go through the proper withdrawal procedures through their dean's offices.

"If they don't have time to do all of these procedures, they can appoint someone in their family to take care of it for them," she said. "About five students being called to active duty came to the financial aid office at the beginning of the year. We're expecting to have more students affected by this."

Jonathan Bjorgaard, sophomore in construction science and an aviations operations specialist in the Kansas National Guard, said he could be called to active duty at any time.

"I could be deployed by the end of March – it's all in the air," he said. "My unit is already in Bosnia."

Bjorgaard said he wouldn't worry about loans if deployed.

"I would just use the money to pay off loans while I'm deployed," he said. "You don't really have anywhere to spend money while you're deployed, so you might as well get that from underneath your belt."

Bjorgaard said that if deployed, he hopes to come back to school.

"It would basically be like taking a year off from school," he said. "Deployments are typically nine months to a year in a peace-time situation, but if the president declares war, active duty could last up to 24 months, and if Congress declares war, it could be up to six months after the war's end."

But this is something Bjorgaard has been prepared for.

"The military does a pretty good job of making sure you have all your ducks in a row before they send you anywhere," he said. "Granted, taking off a year of school is nobody's idea of a great time, but it's worth it to me to say I'm doing my part – a year of school is something you can get back easily enough."

FITNESS | Changes made in routines in 2nd week

said. "She's doing good about eating more frequently throughout the day and having a more well-rounded diet."

Shufelberger said she was surprised at some of Bullard's advice.

"She told me that I did pretty well with writing down everything," Shufelberger said. "I have a hard time getting enough protein into my diet,because I don't eat a lot of meat, so I need to work on that, and she actually told me that I needed more fat intake."

Fat is necessary to function properly, Bullard said.

"Your diet needs to be low in fat, but not too low," she said. "Hers was just a little too low."

Bullard said Shufelberger is doing better than most people after just one week. Caouette agreed.

"She is doing excellent," she said. "She finished everything she was supposed to do. She exceeded her cardio recommendation, and completed her three weight-training days and her intensity is staying pretty strong, too."

Caouette said she changed her weight-lifting routine from three total-body weight-training days to two upper- and lower-body workouts each.

"If you want to gain muscle, you do fewer reps at a pretty heavy weight, but if you just want to just tone and not bulk up, you do more repetitions at low or medium weight," Caouette said.

Shufelberger said that is just what she is hoping to do.

"A lot of times when I work out, I tend to bulk up and gain more muscle," she said. "I'd rather lose weight than build muscle."

She said her exercise routine is the easiest because she already exercised regularly at the beginning of last semester.

"When I exercise, it makes me feel better," Shufelberger said. "I've been doing good, incentive-wise, because the program is watching me to see how well I do."

Shufelberger said keeping variety in her routine also helps her motivation.

"As long as I can keep a variety, I do pretty well. Just as long as I don't do the same thing every day – you know, mixing it up with cardio, EFX one day, walking or running another."

Caouette said the Wellness Center will only take body fat percentages at the beginning and end of the program.

"It won't change that much from week to week. The goal is to change it throughout the six weeks, so it's really pointless to test it every week," she said.

Until then, Shufelberger will continue to work out and eat right.

Dusty Ewing, freshman in architectural engineering and Shufelberger's former racquetball partner, said he admires her effort.

"She's gone to the Rec a lot more and is always out doing something," he said. "I think it's great. I wish I was that motivated to get out there and do something like that every day."

Bramlage sellout expected for 5th time in 2 years

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will start the standard five players when the Wildcats square off against Oklahoma State at 7 p.m. Saturday.

But the Wildcats' "sixth man" could play as big a part in the contest as anyone wearing a jersey and shorts.

A sellout crowd is likely, with only about 300 tickets left as of Thursday night, according to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics.

The problem is one Coach Deb Patterson said said she's willing to deal with.

"This team has really created an intimidating home court by virtue of the involvement of our crowd and the comfort level our players have established in creating a feeling of home here," Patterson said.

"You can play at home, but unless you have this sense of being backed up and feeling empowered by being home, it doesn't necessarily mean much."

At Bramlage Coliseum, it's meant a great deal.

K-State's 17-game home winning streak, which dates back to last season and encompasses four sellout crowds, ranks as the fourth-longest in the country, and with a win Saturday, the Wildcats (22-2, 9-1) would set the mark for the most home wins in a season, eclipsing the 1981-82 team's 15-1 mark at Ahearn Field House.

"It's something every team hopes to create, and whether you continue the streak or you don't continue the streak, at some point in time, you've created something bigger," Patterson said. "That's what I'm impressed by here at Kansas State."

The Cowgirls (5-16, 1-9) have experienced the difficulty of playing at Bramlage, too.

They haven't won in Manhattan since Feb. 5, 1997.

But despite the friendly environment, K-State isn't banking on an easy win this weekend.

"When you play a South division opponent for the first time and you don't have that sense of familiarity, even though you're playing them at home, there's a huge challenge there because it's a new team," Patterson said.

Oklahoma State vs. No. 5 K-State

7 p.m. Saturday, Bramlage Coliseum (13,340)

In fact, the last time K-State faced an unfamiliar Oklahoma State team, the Cowgirls proved too much of a challenge and upset the Cats 68-60 to snap K-State's 14-game winning streak.

"Your team is having to make reads and adjustments for a first time, and that's always challenging," Patterson said, "but I'd sure rather do it at home than on the road."

The Wildcats will face three of its next four opponents at home before finishing the season on the road with two games at Colorado and Texas Tech that could determine the conference's top seed in the Big 12 Tournament.

That makes K-State's remaining home games all the more important, Patterson said.

"Flat out, you've just got to maximize your opportunities at home," she said, "because you never know what the road's going to bring."

The game also represents another chance for the Cowgirls, who have stumbled in league play this season, to get back off the mats and gain momentum going into the postseason.

"February is that time when the teams that are really struggling to make a move are digging in as hard as they can, and the top-tier teams have been playing at such a peak level for so long that it's very, very challenging to stay at that level through the course of a long season," Patterson said.

Staying at that level will be critical Saturday against upset-minded Oklahoma State.

"The extent to which you can," Patterson said, "is the extent to which you separate yourself."

Charting the sellouts

- Jan. 25, 2003, vs. No. 17/16 Texas
  The second-largest crowd in Bramlage history sees K-State handle the Longhorns, 71-69.
- Feb. 2, 2002, vs. No. 16/12 Iowa State
  K-State's third sellout of the year goes home unhappy after a 86-72 upset loss to the Cyclones.
- Jan. 27, 2002, vs. No. 12/13 Texas Tech
  K-State upsets the Lady Raiders, 76-63, in front of 13,340 before jumping to the top 10 in both polls.
- Jan. 12, 2002, vs. Nebraska
  K-State's largest crowd ever (13,466) packs Bramlage to see the Cats beat the Huskers, 85-71.

Pair of Cats among Big 12 elite in art of shot-blocking

Madden, Ohlde two of the best in conference, K-State history

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There are two great momentum swings in basketball – dunks and blocks.

Both are like a bolt of lightning, sending crowds into frenzy. The entire face of a game can change in a moment.

In women's basketball, dunks are a rarity. Blocks, however, are something at which K-State has excelled.

Sophomore center Brie Madden knows about blocked shots. At Mansfield High School in Arlington, Texas, Madden averaged nearly three rejections per contest.

That experience has carried over to her career in Manhattan where, despite often being called on from the bench, Madden has averaged 1.7 blocks-per-game.

"I was always told when I was younger, 'Go block a shot!'" Madden said. "I was so much taller then, it was easy."

With Madden, it still looks easy.

In the four games leading up to Nebraska, Madden had blocked eight shots and needs just eight more to move into third place all-time at K-State.

She now sits third in the Big 12 in blocked shots, despite logging far fewer minutes than teammate and conference-leader Nicole Ohlde.

"It's big when Ohlde can get out there and block a shot," sophomore guard Megan Mahoney said. "It gets us pumped up and gets some momentum."

Ohlde, only a junior, already has 131 career blocks. Averaging over two blocks per game, Ohlde is on pace to match the Big 12 career record of 208, set by Colorado's Britt Hartshorn. Last season, Ohlde blocked 69 attempts, the third-best single season tally in Big 12 history.

The fact that K-State has two of the premier shot-blockers in the Big 12 presents a hefty challenge for opponents.

"Having athletic players that like to contest shots brings that extra factor to defense," Madden said. "It clogs up the middle, and people don't want to penetrate as much."

Taking away penetration has helped K-State hold teams to 56.5 points-per-game, second in the Big 12. Seven times the Wildcats have held opponents to fewer than 50 points, including limiting Nebraska to 47 Wednesday night.

But defense isn't the only benefactor of a swatted shot.

"It's a big defensive play," Mahoney said. "Brie's been doing well on the defensive end. She's great at blocking shots, and it gets us excited and pumped up."

Blocked shots lead to momentum and, more importantly, intimidation.

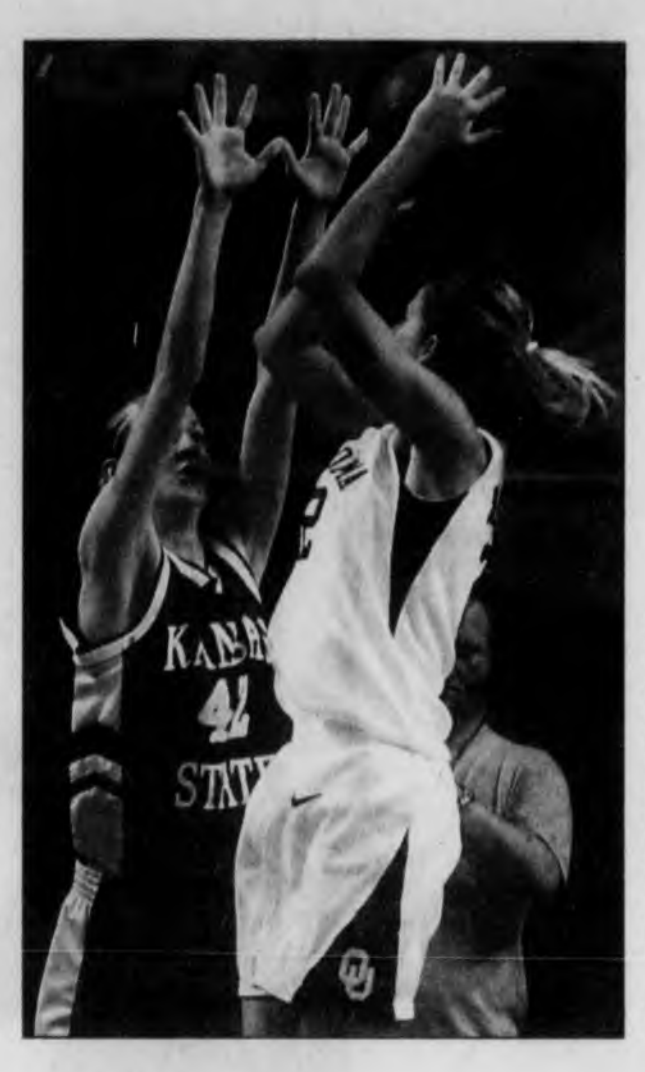
Blocked shots also lead to transition baskets, where K-State's athletic ability leads to many uncontested baskets.

While blocking a shot might seem simple, Madden contends it's an art.

"I don't want people to think I have an art, but it is," Madden said. "Timing is huge. You need to know when you're in good position to do it, which is something I haven't perfected yet. But if the timing is right, it just happens."

This season, blocking shots has become a team affair.

Sophomore Kendra Wecker sits 10th on K-State's career list. As a team, the Wildcats have blocked 114 shots this season, putting K-State on a similar pace to last year's recording setting 150 mark.



If offense wins games and defense wins championships, K-State is poised for a title run.

"Defense is always going to be a huge factor," Madden said. "Blocking just comes with it."

Return to sender

K-State has 114 blocks this season, second only to last year's 140, for most in school history. Sophomore Brie Madden and junior Nicole Ohlde are big reasons why.

- Madden has at least one block in each of the Cats' last five contests and is second on the team with 40.
- Ohlde leads the team in blocked shots with 44 and has posted four 4-block games this season.

Oklahoma's Theresa Schuknecht tries to shoot over the hands of K-State's Brie Madden on Feb. 1 at the Lloyd Noble Center in Norman, Okla. The Cats beat the Sooners, 74-45, to post the program's first win in Norman since 1997.

Statistical comparison

K-State has an advantage on paper, leading in all but steals per game.

The Cowgirls' 1-9 record puts Oklahoma State last in the Big 12 standings, while K-State has a share of the conference league at 9-1.

Last season, the Cowgirls upset the Cats in Stillwater to end a 14-game winning streak.

However, Oklahoma State hasn't won in Bramlage Coliseum since Feb. 5, 1997.

OSU's sorry past to come into play against K-State

BEN FEHR

After an overwhelming number of positive and wholesome responses (some 30+ death threats) rolled into my e-mail inbox following a sound trashing of Nebraska's athletic program, I thought I'd try the Cowboys.

Or, more appropriately, the Cowgirls.

Here is a squad that is about to be chewed up and spit out by K-State as the worst team in the Big 12 and victim number 19 on a long list of consecutive unworthy opponents that dared set foot in Bramlage Coliseum over the past two seasons.

Perhaps K-State should invest in a new banner to plaster to the rafters in Bramlage: All Ye Who Enter – Beware the Purple Haze.

The prospect of facing the 22-2 Wildcats in Manhattan can't be comforting to OSU head coach Julie Goodenough, who, at 5-16 overall and 1-9 in Big 12 play, has been anything but this season.

But the Cowgirls probably won't be as terrified as they should be, because somehow, some way, OSU was able to beat the Wildcats in Stillwater last season.

That particular effort snapped a 14-game win streak the Wildcats were strutting around with last year and inspired the Cowgirls to lose just seven of their last 13 contests. That's what I call momentum.

OSU's women have lost seven in a row, essentially locking up last place in the Big 12 food chain, thanks to a Feb. 2 loss to Nebraska at home.

These girls are pretty bad.

Which is kind of surprising when you take into account the success the men's basketball team is having, though the two obviously are not connected in any way except they play on the same court and go to the same university.

But let's face it, even the men's success this season is in direct contrast to the consistency with which Oklahoma State has turned out athletic futility over the last 100, 200 years.

Perhaps no other school in the Big 12, other than the University of Kansas and Eric Chenowith, can say the legacy of its athletic program rests on the shoulders of one man more than Oklahoma State.

Everybody knows who he is, and everybody knows he shouldn't have stopped playing. This man will go down in history as one of the greatest athletes to ever compete.

That's right. Step aside, Barry - "Big Country" is here.

Perhaps no other athlete in history brought the intangibles Bryant Reeves did.

There was the flat top, the menacing stare, the water buffalo-like strength, and, like Chenowith, the love of nature, friendship and humanity.

Sure Barry Sanders broke rushing records in his time with the Cowboys and went on to have one of the most decorated careers in the history of the NFL, but did Sanders bring half the athletic presence that Reeves did? I think not.

Unfortunately, for OSU, no player with athleticism and strength even comparable to that of Reeves, male or female, has called Stillwater home since Big Country skipped town in 1995.

Which means that, athletically, the Cowgirls will have little to counter the formidable Wildcats this Saturday in Bramlage.

And the revenge K-State will exact against OSU will look a lot like a Bryant Reeves versus Eddie Sutton arm-wrestling contest.

DEPTH DISCOVERY

Bench players stepping up big for Wildcats

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Maybe Coach Deb Patterson heard whispers around the league before Wednesday night's 64-47 win over Nebraska at Bramlage Coliseum.

It didn't take the most observant women's basketball fan to notice Patterson's Wildcats were a little thin when it came to depth.

One thing is for sure, though. Patterson knew actions would speak louder than words against the Huskers.

Three players who started the season next to Patterson on the bench accounted for 33 percent of K-State's scoring, including a career-high 12 from Amy Dutmer – a fixture in the starting lineup since sophomore guard Laurie Koehn went down with an ankle injury.

"I thought it was the kind of game, even early, where we were going to be able to test some of those waters," Patterson said. "I thought our inexperienced and younger players answered it well."

Saturday's contest against Oklahoma State could be similar in some respects.

The Huskers and Cowgirls both fall at or near the bottom of the Big 12 standings and have statistically poor defenses. K-State had no problem jumping out to an early lead Wednesday night, and if the same situation develops Saturday, the bench could be cleared even earlier.

But that doesn't mean the Wildcats are conceding anything with their starters sitting instead of playing.

"They're smart and aggressive when they come in, and that's something they've proven for the majority of the season this year," sophomore Kendra Wecker said.

K-State's Jessica McFarland shoots the ball over Nebraska's Amanda Cleveland during the first half Wednesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

With Wecker – the conference's leading scorer – and fellow All-America candidate Nicole Ohlde out for much of the first half against Nebraska, Dutmer and freshman Jessica McFarland were the ones making the statement Wednesday night against Nebraska.

McFarland, in particular, caught Patterson's eye with seven points and three rebounds in 17 minutes.

"Hopefully, those are the type of quality minutes she

Ohlde joins 1,500-point club

Sophomore Nicole Ohlde became just the sixth player in K-State history to score 1,500 points with her 14-point Wednesday night.

Ohlde joins past Wildcat greats Diana Miller (1,705 career points), Eileen Feeney (1,670), Nadira Hazim (1,670), Tammie Romstad (1,548) and Brit Jacobson (1,519).

Against then No. 24/23 Colorado on Jan. 11, Ohlde passed Shanele for sixth on K-State's all-time scoring list.

With eight points against Oklahoma State on Saturday, the junior would move past Jacobson into the top five.

STILLWATER, Okla. — Scoring had been no problem for K-State's women before their game at Oklahoma State.

In the team's five conference wins, the Cats averaged 77 points per game. No team had limited K-State's top three scorers — Laurie Koehn, Kendra Wecker and Nicole Ohlde — to less than 45 points.

Against the Cowgirls, though, the only thing the Cats could get to drop were tears after their 60-68 loss.

Most noticeably, OSU held Koehn to just eight points.

Despite having their top scorers clamped and turning the ball over 19 times, the Cats still managed to make two more field goals than the Cowgirls and the same number of three-point shots.

Ohlde still managed to score 17 points, and senior guard Kristin Rethman picked up for a quiet Koehn by hitting five treys for 15 points.

The difference in the game, though, was at the free-throw line. OSU shot 18 more free throws than K-State and converted those into 12 points compared to four for the Cats.

History looms over Cats

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Oklahoma State Cowgirls' women's basketball team is coached by Julie Goodenough.

Against K-State last year, OSU certainly became a reflection of their coach. The Cowgirls were good enough to beat the then-No. 9/15 Wildcats to pull off one of the season's biggest upsets and certainly one of the most surprising in Big 12 play.

Oklahoma State's 68-60 win over K-State on Jan. 19, 2002, in Stillwater, Okla., marked a victory the Cowgirls picked up after having lost three games in a row to ranked opponents by double digits.

The win also snapped a 14-game K-State winning streak.

Coach Deb Patterson said this year's Wildcats haven't forgotten how badly they were embarrassed last year in Stillwater.

"They will remember it, I will remember it, and I'm likely to remind them of it," Patterson said. "Because, if for nothing else, you have to have a sense of how great the competition is in this league.

"Oklahoma State is, was and always will be a very physical team."

Being physical, particularly down low, certainly was a key for Oklahoma State in its last run-in with K-State.

Then-sophomore Trisha Skibbe scored 23 and gathered nine rebounds to lead OSU past K-State. But Skibbe didn't do it alone.

Guard Chantoya Hawkins, a junior in 2001-02, scored 13 of her 18 points in the second half to go along with senior Tari Cummings' 13.

Patterson said the Cowgirls' look hasn't changed much from last season.

"We'll see a great post player in Trisha Skibbe coming in here, as well as Chantoya Hawkins and the quickness they have on the perimeter.

"Nobody really backs down in this league," Patterson said. "And if you catch them backing down once, it's very surprising if you see it a second time."

And while Oklahoma State lost Cummings, Skibbe (16.7 ppg) and Hawkins (7.1 ppg) certainly are capable of giving good teams problems.

That fact was reiterated Wednesday night, as the Cowgirls nearly upset Texas in Stillwater, losing to the No. 11 Longhorns 62-60, as K-State was beating up on Nebraska.

The loss to Texas marked the Cowgirls' seventh-straight loss, but OSU wasn't winning much the last time they beat K-State either.

Patterson said Oklahoma State's effort against Texas is just another reminder of how seriously K-State must take every Big 12 opponent.

"When you see the two-point victory Texas had over Oklahoma State," she said. "It really reiterates how challenging it is, night in and night out, to win basketball games in this league.

"No matter how talented you are, and no matter where your opponent is ranked in league standings."

DEPTH
Bench players prove valuable

can build on, and it certainly will give me greater confidence as we continue through the season to pull her off the bench," Patterson said

Those opportunities could increase if McFarland continues her steady improvement during practice, Patterson said.

"As we've moved out of January and into February, Jessica's been more and more consistent at practice and really has done a great job there. The first time we played at Nebraska, she was effective, and that certainly was something I was aware of going into the game, and I felt confident putting her into the mix because of that," she said.

With the Cats' depth still a question when fatigue and foul trouble come into play, confidence in the reserves is a must.

"Our bench players have done a great job this year of coming in and stepping up at different times," Wecker said. "Amy's been very consistent since Laurie's been out, and Jess has been coming in and playing excellent minutes and taking advantage of her opportunities.

"That's what we're going to need, down the stretch, especially."

Gas prices continue to rise

By Katie Copeland
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jason Gordon will do almost anything for cheaper gasoline prices.

"If you have to have gas," Gordon, junior in business, said, "You have to have gas."

With gas prices on the rise, Gordon and other drivers are being forced to drain their pockets while filling up at the pump.

"It will stop me from going wherever I want, whenever I want in my car," Gordon said.

As the threat of war in Iraq and fear of terrorist attacks grew, gas prices climbed 10 cents to a national average of $1.65 per gallon during the past week. A strike in Venezuela, one of the United States' largest suppliers of crude oil, has also been a factor in the fluctuating prices of gasoline.

Amanda Millard, public affairs coordinator for AAA, said the price increase began shortly after President Bush's State of the Union address on Jan. 28. Since then, the price of regular unleaded gasoline has risen 13.4 cents per gallon.

The national average price of gas is the highest since June 2001 as well as AAA's highest documented price in February.

In Kansas, gas prices have run parallel to the national average. Today's average fuel price rests at $1.61 per gallon – compared to a mid-January price of $1.41. One year ago, motorists were paying $1.09 per gallon for regular unleaded gas, according to AAA's online Fuel Gauge Report.

"I don't know that the prices raise 10 cents that often, but people are scared and

Strader no longer a suspect

Man questioned in Kemp case absolved

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OLATHE, Kan. – As a man charged with rapes in Kansas and Missouri was brought back from Utah Thursday, police who wanted to question him about the killing of a young woman last year said he'd been cleared of suspicion.

James C. Strader, 27, was arrested Monday in Richfield, Utah, after being stopped on suspicion of driving off without paying for gasoline.

He is charged with kidnapping and raping two women from Kansas and a 14-year-old Missouri girl.

He waived extradition, and he arrived at Kansas City International Airport late Thursday afternoon with police sent to Utah to pick him up.

Shortly after he was led off the plane, police in suburban Leawood, Kan., announced that DNA testing had cleared him of involvement in the beating death last June of Ali Kemp, 19.

The K-State student was found in the pump room at a neighborhood swimming pool where she worked.

The Johnson County crime laboratory compared DNA evidence from the pump room against samples from Strader. Technicians determined Wednesday night that the killer's DNA did not match that of Strader, who was investigated twice as a potential suspect.

Leawood police and Roger Kemp, the slain woman's father, had said for several days that they were not pinning their hopes on Strader, who offered a good alibi the first time police talked to him in August.

VALENTINE VOWS

They knew they wanted to marry, but they didn't have much time.

Tony Novak will possibly be deployed to Kuwait within days. So he and Staci Morgan, junior in secondary education and Spanish, decided Valentine's Day at the Riley County District Court House was the right time to marry.

"It feels right," Morgan said.

Morgan and Novak, who is in an infantry unit in Bravo Company 1/41 in the headquarters platoon at Fort Riley, have been engaged for more than a year, and have known each other since high school. Novak returned Feb. 7 from training in California, so Morgan said she had to act fast to get a wedding planned.

"I had a lot of help from my girls and the Army wives," she said.

Nine other couples also wanted to have quick weddings or to have simple services on Friday. Ten couples wed throughout the day in Division II court – two during the lunch hour – at the courthouse.

As each couple waited its turn with friends and family in the lounge, most said they couldn't explain how they

Student soldiers called up

This month, Aaron Price is studying mechanical engineering and serving as a resident assistant at Haymaker Hall. Next month, he might be halfway across the globe fighting the war on terror.

Sgt. Price, a member of the Army Reserves, was brought into active duty last week and is preparing to be deployed with the 450th Transportation Battalion. A deployment ceremony was held Friday evening as soldiers were briefed about what makes an active duty soldier and received coins symbolizing their sacrifice.

When he received his orders, the first thing Price had to do was withdraw from K-State.

Enlistment program designed to entice college graduates

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A $5,000 cash bonus. An $18,000 immunity from student loans. Nine hundred dollars per month for a year of graduate work or $366 a month for three years of graduate or undergraduate work.

Sound appealing?

Uncle Sam hopes it is. And he hopes at least one of the four enlistment options will attract a new kind of soldier.

The new military short-term enlistment program slated to begin Oct. 1 was created to encourage college graduates, who normally would not consider a military career, to enlist.

"We found that this was a small niche of the population that we were not attracting," said Gary Bloomfield, chief of advertising and public affairs for the Kansas Army Recruiting Station. "Fifteen to 18 months gives them an option that is not currently offered."

Congress authorized the National Call to Service enlistment option as part of the fiscal 2003 National Defense Authorization Act. The program will work like this: A recruit enlists for the option and incurs a 15-month active duty service obligation following completion of initial-entry training, for a total commitment of about 19 months.

"In the discussions I have been involved in it has generally been perceived that a lot more people would be involved if a shorter enlistment program was offered," said Lt. Col. Arthur DeGroat, head of military science department. "This is a step in that direction."

Few college graduates see enlisting in the military as an option because they see it as a long-term commitment,

Childhood home where Lennon wrote 'She Loves You' to be opened to public

Illustration by Adam Hayes | COLLEGIAN

LIVERPOOL, England – The house where John Lennon spent his childhood and wrote some of the Beatles' first hits will open to the public next month, Britain's National Trust said Friday.

Mendips, the suburban home Lennon shared with his Aunt Mimi, was bought last year by the Beatle's widow, Yoko Ono, who donated it to the heritage organization.

"When John's house came up for sale I wanted to preserve it for the people of Liverpool and John Lennon and Beatles fans all over the world," Ono said.

"The house resonates with a special atmosphere. It was, after all, where many of John's songs that we now hold so dear were born."

Lennon lived at 251 Menlove Avenue in the Liverpool suburb of Woolton from age 5 – when his parents separated and he went to live with his Aunt Mimi – until he was 23.

He taught himself to play guitar in the four-bedroom 1930s house, and reportedly wrote "She Loves You" in the front room.

Ono bought the house for an unspecified sum after the National Trust, which owns Paul McCartney's childhood home, said it was not interested in buying the property.

The Trust said it had replaced windows and removed modern flooring to restore the house to the way it looked when Lennon lived there in the 1950s and early 1960s.

Starting March 29, the Trust will run tours of the house in connection with the McCartney home at 20 Forthlin Road in Liverpool's Allerton district.

Ono becomes philosophical on birthday

NEW YORK – More than 30 years after the breakup of the Beatles and on the brink of her 70th birthday, Yoko Ono has become philosophical about the days when many Beatles fans hated her and blamed her for the band's demise.

"I think that through that kind of incredible, strange confrontation, people started to understand me," the widow of John Lennon told the New York Post for a story in Sunday's editions.

Ono turns 70 on Tuesday and more than 200 guests are expected to attend a cocktail reception in her honor at a Manhattan restaurant, the Post said.

Ono keep busy these days managing the legacy of her late husband and producing dance mixes of his music and her own.

She is about to release a dance mix of Lennon's "Walking on Thin Ice" – the song Lennon was working on the night he was murdered in 1980.

"If he's observing me from up there, I'm sure he's proud of me," Ono said.

"It's going to go on and on. This is what I love now, so it's great."

Complaints voiced against Pearlman

ORLANDO, Fla. – Boy-band hitmaker Lou Pearlman is the target of a state probe into complaints that hundreds of aspiring models and actors were duped into paying up to $1,500 each for spots on his company's Web site.

Clients say they were led to believe that Pearlman's company, Trans Continental Talent Inc., would help them find work – not just post their pictures online.

The investigation, which began in August, has turned up "hundreds of potential violations" but no one who actually landed a job through the company, Assistant Attorney General Jackie Dowd said.

Pearlman, best known for launching the Backstreet Boys and 'N Sync, issued a statement Friday saying he was unaware of the investigation.

Florida law prohibits talent agencies from collecting fees upfront, but the promoter said Trans Continental was exempt because it is a "scouting" company that finds talent without marketing it.

The company's Web site warns hopeful models that "chances of becoming a superstar in this industry are slim" and the company "will not book you directly."

But Trans Continental claims more than 1,000 agencies and clients are registered with it.

Day dedicated to Taylor

DANA POINT, Calif. – A nasty cold and a broken foot that put her in a wheelchair couldn't keep Elizabeth Taylor from at a benefit for AIDS research.

After all, Gov. Gray Davis had declared it Elizabeth Taylor Day for her work in support for the AIDS cause.

The actress made her planned address at the Feb. 8 gala, although she missed a dinner preceding it – disappointing some 70 partygoers who'd paid $2,000 each to dine with her and other celebrities including Warren Beatty, Annette Bening, Carrie Fisher, Penny Marshall and Tom Petty.

"Every day is filled with threats ... but the reality is, we are in the middle of one of the worst threats, global AIDS," Taylor told about 600 people at Orange County's St. Regis Hotel after gingerly making her way to the stage.

"As of January, 42 million people worldwide are affected. In 1984, I made a vow to myself and a vow to God to do something. Together, we will!"

The benefit raised $230,000 for AIDS Services Foundation Orange County and the Laguna Art Museum.

Rodeo entertains, informs children at Town Center

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Traci Hatch brought her two-year old son to the Junior Rodeo as a part of a promise to her late grandfather.

Her grandfather was always involved with horses and when he died, she promised him she'd keep on the tradition.

Hatch's son, Tyson, enjoyed the Saturday event at the Manhattan Town Center, sponsored by Dick Edwards, KXBZ-FM 104.7, and Orschlen's Farm and Home Supply.

In fact, Tyson won the first-place medal for the horseshoe toss in the boys' under-five category.

The Junior Rodeo is put on each year to help promote the K-State Rodeo, said Kasey Lee, sophomore in business marketing.

"Lots of times families come to this and then want to go to the rodeo," she said.

At the Junior Rodeo, K-State rodeo club members volunteered in the three events: horseshoe toss, plastic steer roping and stick horse barrel race. In addition, volunteers showed competitors how to use lassos and acted as an object to follow during the barrel race.

Autumn Kleiner, Miss K-State Rodeo and junior in accounting, promoted the event by signing picture autographs.

Kleiner said the Junior Rodeo promotes the K-State rodeo and educates children.

"It's opening eyes to what rodeo is in a safe way," she said.

Kleiner will relinquish her crown to the 2003 Miss K-State Rodeo as a part of the K-State Rodeo at Weber Arena Feb. 21-22.

Three-year old Brett Carson, son of Melissa and Tim Carson, was excited his "meema and peepa" were going to take him to K-State's Rodeo.

After competing in the three events, Brett said roping the steer was the hardest.

"I tried it and I didn't get it, then I tried it and I didn't get it, then I tried it and I didn't get it," Brett said.

Five-year old Alexis Wilson, daughter of Rachel Wilson, dressed up for the rodeo with pink cowgirl boots and a buttoned-up American flag shirt.

She said her boots made her slip and fall as she was rounding the barrels with the stick horse, but the hardest event was roping a cow.

"It was hard to get it around the horns but I only did it one time," she said.

K-State graduate Mark McClaskey, of KXBZ-FM 104.7, emceed the Junior Rodeo, and has worked in it every year.

"You never know what the kids are going to do," McClaskey said. "They really get into it, especially the five-and-under kids."

Kleiner agreed.

"These kids are just a hoot," she said. "They all did a good job and tried hard. They're all winners."

Hiles, Sumner focus on unnecessary expenses, efficiency of budget

Presidential pair uses campaign to stress importance of setting, achieving realistic goals

By Katie Lane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Julia Hiles

Ashleigh Sumner

Take it one step at a time.

That is the strategy that Julia Hiles and Ashleigh Sumner, candidates for student body president and vice president, respectively, plan on using to implement their platform issues.

"A big part of this is that we get other students involved helping us, because obviously the two of us alone can't do all this work," Sumner said. "We need to set up committees and different organizations to help in allowing this."

The team's first line of business, if elected to office, is to eliminate unnecessary expenses, Sumner said.

"Our first platform is 'what people want,'" she said. "We want to achieve realistic goals without having the students spend more money. We will not focus our energy on starting new programs which would cost more money, but we are concerned with the efficiency of the programs that already exist at K-State. Everything on campus mainly could be run more efficiently. We just want to focus our attention on that."

Primary Elections

This is the first in a five-day series profiling the platforms of the student body president and vice president candidates in alphabetical order.

Primary elections will be Feb. 25 and 26.

Sumner said one of her goals is getting students to start thinking about the budget and ways to be more efficient.

"We're going to eliminate unnecessary expenses," Sumner said.

"An example of this would be if you are president or vice president, you have a say in where the money is attributed to. For example, when (President Zac) Cook had a say in the new student welcoming center. That's something that we don't need.

"We are on such a strict budget. SGA has a lot of say in that. We can help eliminate some of those unnecessary expenses."

The next item on the Hiles-Sumner platform is promoting fitness and raising health awareness on campus, Hiles said.

"We are thinking of a university fitness council to educate students on different ways to live a more healthy lifestyle and the possible effects of living an unhealthy lifestyle," Hiles said.

One way to promote fitness is to set up a run to get everyone involved. It could be sponsored by the university, Sumner said.

Focusing on less-recognized majors and organizations is the third goal for Hiles and Sumner.

"We want to allow them to promote themselves on campus a little more, letting students figure out what they are about," Hiles said.

Out of the three platform issues, Sumner said the only one that could pose a problem is the third issue – focusing on smaller organizations and majors.

"They have to be willing to put themselves out there to promote themselves," Sumner said.

"We would hope to help them to do that. I think some students go into a major not realizing that they are getting a bachelor's degree in kinesiology, but they necessarily can't go in and use that as a business degree. I think some students aren't aware of that."

Accomplishing every goal in a single year won't be a problem, Hiles said.

"One of my biggest things is when people do run for office they plan on accomplishing two or three things," she said. "You have a whole year to be in office, and you can accomplish more than two or three things if you stick to it, put your mind to it and work hard."

In order to achieve the big goals, it is important to focus on the smaller ones, Sumner said.

"There are ways to accomplish three big things, but our whole motto is focus on the smaller things. We feel like we can get a whole bunch done in a year, versus two or three things."

While it is possible to accomplish two or three big goals, Hiles said it would be more beneficial for students if many smaller goals could be attained.

"Students can see the small changes and they can also see the big changes," Hiles said. "What would you rather have – 100 small things or two or three big things?"

NATO breaks monthlong stalemate regarding Iraq, reinforces peace

By Paul Geitner
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium –

NATO, mired in its biggest rift since the Cold War, broke a monthlong stalemate Sunday over defensive actions in case of war in Iraq, reaffirming alliance solidarity while supporting U.N. efforts for a peaceful solution to the crisis with Baghdad.

"Alliance solidarity has prevailed," NATO Secretary-General Lord Robertson said. "We have been able collectively to overcome the impasse."

The decision to start planning for Turkey's defense, however, was taken without France, which was shut out of the room as the alliance pushed to resolve the crisis.

A senior NATO official said he expected the planning would be wrapped up quickly and the committee would be ready to make a decision on deployment of actual aid within a few days.

With France out of the way, the two other holdouts, Germany and Belgium, dropped their objections.

For a month, France, Germany and Belgium had blocked a NATO decision to begin planning to help fortify Turkey – the only NATO ally bordering Iraq – against any potential reprisals. They argued such a move was premature and would undermine U.N. efforts to avoid a war.

At the last minute Sunday, Belgium insisted on linking any eventual NATO deployment to developments at the U.N. Security Council.

Announcing the agreement, Robertson said: "This is not a step toward going to war. We have stated the obvious, that is we support the United Nations process, that these decisions are purely for the defense of Turkey."

The final statement underlined that the allies continued "to support efforts in the United Nations to find a peaceful solution to the crisis."

The three holdouts issued a statement stressing their wish to honor NATO, but also their desire to disarm Iraq without force.

They noted that not all alternatives to force had been "fully exploited."

NATO diplomats said the United States and other allies objected in principle to tying alliance decision-making to any other organization.

NATO, trying to end the stalemate, put the issue Sunday to its Defense Planning Committee, which excludes France. Paris left NATO's military command structure in the late 1960s and participates only in political consultations.

The committee was used ahead of the 1991 war against Iraq to approve aid for Turkey. But NATO has sought to limit its use since the end of the Cold War in a spirit of rapprochement with Paris.

"We would have preferred to have a decision ... with all 19 members present," Roberston said. "France believed that these measures were not yet opportune. But I hope that people will not in any way get a signal that it implies any less commitment," to Turkey's defense.

The United States proposed a month ago that the alliance consider sending early warning AWACS aircraft, missile defenses and anti-biochemical units to Turkey.

But after France, Germany and Belgium blocked the planning for three weeks, Turkey invoked NATO's mutual defense treaty, which binds the allies to talks when one feels threatened, but so far to no avail.

Turkey feels especially vulnerable since it is considering allowing tens of thousands of U.S. soldiers to use Turkish facilities for a possible Iraq war.

The United States and its allies say denying support for Turkey's defense erodes the alliance's credibility and sends the wrong signal to Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

Some of the measures can be done bilaterally – Germany has already agreed to send Patriot missiles to Turkey – but those missiles need to be linked to NATO radar networks to be effective.

TO THE POINT

Limited-term enlist option a positive one

The Army's 15-month enlistment program, which will go into effect Oct. 1, will be a valuable addition to the nation's defense and potential soldiers' lives.

Often, young Americans' lives are put on hold for four years while they serve. However, this new program not only gives students a way to pay off student loans, but offers a shorter active duty commitment.

By only requiring 15 months of active duty, students are free to attend graduate school or continue their undergraduate work.

Not only that, but the option of serving in either a reserve unit for national emergencies or organizations like AmeriCorps or Peace Corps gives the nation more civilians who are trained to help their fellow Americans in their time of need.

The short commitment program is perfect for students who are interested in the opportunity to travel or who have the desire to serve their country, but not to delay their education or career.

I thought Paul's article was funny as heck. I compliment Paul on that nice article.

If Jennifer Lopez married Ben Affleck, it would be J-Loaf.

$1,700 in tuition and my professors still tell me I can't come to class late. Whatever. I'll do what I want.

Is it considered stalking if the person doesn't know they're being stalked?

A blue K-State hoodie — who wears that?

Is it so hard to walk on the right side of the sidewalk?

I don't go to class. I sit here and drink beer, and yet, I see people who do, and I still get better grades than them.

I wish NASCAR drivers would learn how to turn right.

You can see the wind on TV.

You NASCAR idiots have to call in because you're too stupid to write a letter to the editor.

I have a heart on.

How many people can say they've had Lucky Charms at 2:30 in the morning with the most perfect girl in the world? That's right. Just me.

I just looked over, and a midget is humping my roommate's leg.

There's something entirely right with the world when a carrot in the shape of a vagina goes on eBay for over $15,000.

To the person who said they're sick of Black History Month: You're just jealous because you're not black.

I want to hump 50 Cent's leg.

But I really want to hump Nelly's leg.

It's so cold outside, my innards are freezing.

Just when you think the drivers in this town can't get any more stupid, it rains.

Knowledge, dialogue improve race relations

"I think March ought to be the month of white people."– Campus Fourum, Feb. 4

"Emancipate yourself from mental slavery. None but ourselves can free our minds." – Bob Marley

"Everybody knows that the world is full of stupid people." – Roger Clyne

FLETCHER JACOBS

What did you think when you saw that in the Fourum? Did you laugh? Did it make you feel uncomfortable at all? Did you just go on to the next one?

Maybe you didn't think it was a big deal, but I did. You also might think I'm some liberal do-gooder for taking some dumb anonymous comment so seriously. The Fourum is full of them after all. But to me, this one is different.

Every February since I've been at K-State, a similar statement has found its way to the Fourum. When is White History Month?

Maybe you think this isn't majority thought at all. I hope you are right. But I'm sure you know people in your life who subscribe to this way of thinking. I do. And it shows how far we still have to go in race relations.

First, let's settle this matter for the ignorant caller and people who share this view. Black History Month started as a Negro History Week in 1926 because black people had been led to believe they had no history. Nothing. Evidently, black people were just hanging out until us whites could come load them in boats to start picking cotton.

The idea was that by learning about their history, they could begin to develop pride and knowledge in their heritage. That leads to cultural empowerment. That leads to the belief that they aren't subhuman or inferior to whites.

The reason we don't have a white history month is that we really don't need it. Since we were the ones telling black people they had no history and were writing the history books, we didn't need the same empowerment.

And, after all, we had brought them over in the chains so we really didn't need help in any power struggle. We were pretty sure of where we stood.

The week expanded to a whole month in 1976 to not only recognize achievements, but also give an understanding of African-American experience. This month is a chance to work on understanding and appreciating our differences, as well as seeing the similarities. But we don't seem to want to that.

People don't like to talk about race. It isn't easy to do. It will bring up conflict and some uncomfortable feelings and nobody likes those things.

But it needs to be talked about because racism and prejudice still exist in this country. We know that. Blacks are better athletes. Whites are smarter. A black man will never become the U.S. president. White people can't dance. We've all heard them.

I'm from small-town Kansas and vividly remember the first time we played a school with black children. Yes, the "n" word was dropped. Just last fall, I heard that same word at a football game describing the play of our starting quarterback by a drunken female fan.

Sure, in the comfort of our own home with members of our own race, we can talk. You know, whites talking about their fondness for KU basketball because they've got white guys. But would that be said out loud to black people?

You don't see that as much. But I was lucky enough to get a chance.

This summer I was a camp counselor in Colorado. My neighbor was Cameron, the only black guy on our 25-plus staff. Cameron was from Texas, knew Spanish and Portuguese, and did a great Ja-Rule impression. He also taught me more about diversity than any sociology class on campus. Cameron taught me that people should never be afraid to talk about things, even if they make you uncomfortable. We had discussions on music, stereotypes, basketball and the Confederate flag. And we didn't always agree. But we talked.

For the rest of my life, I'll remember him talking about what it is like to be the only person in the room with a different color of skin, a feeling I've never had. Or how he felt about the look he got from one of the parents dropping off their white children in the care of this black counselor for the next five weeks. The look that seemed to say, "Oh...a black guy? That wasn't in the brochure."

Now you may still think I'm some liberal do-gooder trying to make us all colorblind or maybe just trying to get in good with black students. I'm sorry for your ignorance. I truly believe this month can be a chance for whites to think about what blacks go through everyday in our country.

We don't all have to hold hands and think everything is great. I still have prejudices, but this month can be an opportunity to recognize them and try to let them go.

I still keep in touch with Cameron. I appreciate the fact he gave me an opportunity to open my eyes. But I really like the fact that I don't think of him as my "black" friend, but just as a friend.

TO THE EDITOR

Proposed war with Iraq not based on actual evidence of potential danger, but on United States' interests concerning power, oil

Editor,

First it was the claim that Iraq harbored al-Qaeda. Not proved. Not even close. Several governments that have been shown whatever intelligence we are not being shown are not convinced. Even John McCain is still not convinced of an alliance between al-Qaeda and Iraq, not even after Colin Powell's very public "conversion." Why then should we, who have been shown far less evidence, be convinced of such a thing?

Then it was the claim that Saddam Hussein is a thug. That did not need proving. It has long been obvious. But there is no precedent in international law for us to go replace him. Nor does his conduct justify our setting such a precedent. (And, of course, we did assist him in his thuggery when it used to suit our purposes. But let that go.)

Then it became the claim Iraq continues to have weapons of mass destruction. In eight years of work, inspectors had destroyed large numbers of such Iraqi weapons. Now they have had just about a month and a half to look for what is left or what might have been developed, under still sanctions, over the past four years.

And now our government proclaims the morally monstrous proposal that, before we even have solid proof of these weapons of mass destruction or of the likelihood of their use, the most powerful armed forces in the world should unleash an attack on a country that, by the estimate of Donald Rumsfeld, is so weak and defenseless it cannot possibly hold out longer than a few weeks.

All along it has been about power and oil. Even before he was elected, President Bush had plans for regime change in Iraq. Check out the Web page for the Project for a New American Century. This advising group to Cheney, Rumsfeld, Wolfowitz, and Bush laid these plans long ago.

All this other stuff has been a smoke screen. And apparently, we are the only people who cannot see through it.

Students single out mates according to attributes during game

By Mako Shores
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Choosing among hair styles, heights and music preferences were just some of the decisions two students had to make about their blind dates.

Matthew Painter, senior in criminology, and Tracy O'Halloran, senior in apparel design, were the candidates in the game show "Singled-Out" Friday night in the K-State Student Union Courtyard as part of the Union Program Council's After-Hours activities for Valentine's Day.

Male and female students signed up before the show to win an all-expense paid date with Painter or O'Halloran.

A group of women gathered behind Painter, who was seated in a stool facing the audience with a purple pass that he could give to a lucky lady contestant who had been eliminated in order to give her a second chance.

Painter's first decision was to eliminate women with short hair like Halle Berry's instead of those with long hair like Gwyneth Paltrow's.

"It's gotta be like Gwyneth's," Painter said.

The short-haired girls walked out in front of Painter so he could get a taste of what he was missing.

One contestant, who had short hair, said she had a good time even if it was only for a minute.

"I wasn't very nervous about it," Kami Schwerdtferger, graduate student in marriage and family therapy, said. "My friend, who actually won the game, got me to do this, and it was fun even though I was out in the first round."

Five women remained for round two when Painter asked each woman a question and by the audience's responses, he was able to decide which three women he would choose to pass on to round three.

To make his decision, Painter requested one woman to do an unusual imitation.

"Give me your best barnyard animal impression," Painter said.

Matt Elliot | COLLEGIAN

Tracy O'Halloran, senior in apparel design, throws up one of her answers to the Union Program Council After Hours game, "Singled Out." "Coming out here was a lot of fun. I was so excited to see the winner. He's so cute," O'Halloran said.

The contestant was able to let only a shy "moo" as her response.

After narrowing down the field to just three women, the race to the finish line was on.

The women were asked questions in which they had two choices. Those who matched Painter's answers moved a step closer to his stool.

The women had choices between Coke or Pepsi, football or basketball, beef or chicken, and cash or credit.

Eleven questions were asked before there was a winner.

Komoss Creamer, graduate student in marriage and family therapy, won "Singled Out" and a date package with Painter that included being picked up by a limo, dinner at Little Apple Brewing Co., tickets to see "Private Eyes," and bowling and pool in the Union.

After doing the show, Creamer had only positive things to say about Painter.

"It was fun, and I had seen the show before so I knew what to expect," Creamer said. "Matt seems like a really nice guy. I'm excited about our date, and we're going to eat lots of steak."

Painter had the same enthusiasm about the upcoming date.

"The experience was fantastic," he said. "It was a huge rush. I got a chance to talk to the girl, and she's awesome and very outgoing. We're going to have a good time on our date."

Next up, O'Halloran went through the same three rounds deciding which guy was right for her.

She chose men with dark hair, but decided to give one blond man a second shot by giving him her purple pass.

O'Halloran narrowed the rest of the men down by choosing men who were class-clowns and those who liked rhythm and blues over rock 'n' roll.

In round two, four contestants remained, and one was asked to show his school spirit by doing a K-State cheer.

Contestant number two did his best impression of Willie the Wildcat's "K-S-U Wildcats" cheer.

"It's not like how Willie would do it, but practice makes perfect," O'Halloran said.

In round three, only six questions had to be asked before Marcus Perry, freshman in architectural engineering, and the recipient of the purple pass, won his date with O'Halloran.

"It was nice being up in front of everyone just dancing around," Perry said.

"The date will be very exciting."

O'Halloran shared his optimism.

"I think the date will be great," she said.

"He even gave me a chocolate heart as a Valentine's gift. He seems like a nice guy."

Dating Doctor advises students

By Mako Shores
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The doctor is in, and you don't have to sit in a waiting room before receiving your dose of advice on dating, relationships, romance and sex.

David Coleman, better known as the Dating Doctor, was the guest lecturer Friday night in Forum Hall as part of the Union Program Council's Valentine's Day events.

Coleman has been honored as the National Speaker of the Year eight times and has appeared on 2,000 college campuses speaking to more than one million people.

Coleman spiced up Valentine's Day with his honest take on relationships, romance, sex, men and women. Audience members were able to ask questions that Coleman answered with straightforward responses.

Marwa Khamis, freshman in chemistry and pre-pharmacy, asked Coleman how a person would get out of a bad date without hurting the other person's feelings.

"Try not to let the person think it was him or her," Coleman said. "Try to put it all on you as much as you can."

The goal of the night was to get everyone in the audience to be able to talk to his or her "hmm," a person one might see and have difficulty approaching.

"Ever see a person that makes you go, 'hmm'?" Coleman said. "Well, I'm going to teach you how to talk to your hmm. I want to be able to raise your relationship I.Q. by the end of the night."

Throughout the lecture, Coleman shared the worst pick-up lines he has ever heard, which included lines like, "My love for you is like diarrhea – I just can't hold it in" and "If you were a hamburger at McDonald's, you'd be McGorgeous."

Coleman talked about common problems that cause relationships to end.

"Before marriage, couples tend to argue about religion, alcohol, money, sex and jealousy," Coleman said. "After marriage, the arguments are about children, relatives, jobs, boredom, which leads to cheating and lack of time."

Khamis said she received some great tips from the lecture.

"I thought it was great and really informative," she said. "He had answers to questions we all have. I had a lot of questions about relationships, and it really helped me out."

Coleman laid out the 15 principles for relationships, which included who controls the relationship and how to find a successful one.

"The person that loves, cares or tries the least controls the relationship," Coleman said. "The one who invests the most will do anything they can do to change the thoughts and behaviors of the other.

"Also, a successful relationship doesn't begin by finding the right person – it begins by being the right person."

In the case of commitment, Coleman said men and women have different views on the situation.

"Men see it as a loss of freedom, while women see it as a positive addition," he said.

Adding more of an interactive aspect to his presentation, Coleman had games the audience members participated in that revealed true feelings and thoughts about how people view certain parts of their lives.

"The characteristics you like about your favorite animal is how you believe people see you," Coleman said. "The way you feel about being in your favorite body of water describes the way you feel about sex."

Coleman wrapped up his lecture with some tips for guys for Valentine's Day 2004.

"Next year, do it on February 13 and say to your girlfriend, 'You shouldn't have to wait another day,'" Coleman said.

Opening Day 2003

A Bright Start

Tim Doty threw up near first base early during the backend of Sunday's doubleheader with Western Illinois.

Doty, it turned out, had been battling the flu.

But the dizzying run production Western faced from the Wildcats in the two-game stint probably made for a dugout full of sick Leathernecks.

K-State put up 23 runs in 18 innings, winning the noon game 14-4 before completing the sweep with a 9-4 twilight victory.

Preseason All-America candidate Pat Maloney, who went 3-for-8 with a home run in the two games, said the Cats' offensive production was a good start.

"It showed a good amount of our hitting," Maloney said. "The first game, for the first couple of innings, we kind of slumped. It was the new pitchers, the different atmosphere, and you're actually facing an opponent this time. But we came out and attacked them after the first

New lights get early-season test

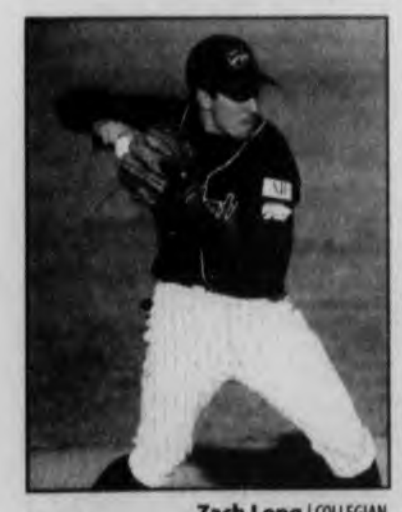
K-State's baseball team finally moved into Tointon Family Stadium on Sunday.

Sure, the Wildcats have played ball at Frank Myers Field since 1961, but on Opening Day 2003, the last obstacle in re-establishing the venue as K-State's home turf was cleared.

The stadium's new lights – 152 in all, mounted on eight poles encircling the stadium – were flipped on for the first time since May 8, 1998, marking the culmination of the athletic department's five-year, $3.1 million stadium renovation.



"It's finally time you can call the place home," outfielder Pat Maloney said. "When your house is being built, you don't call it your home because you can't move in totally, but now everything's done."

Everything includes a new 36-foot-wide by 20-foot-tall scoreboard, which kept the tally for the Cats' first two wins of 2003 on Sunday against Western Illinois.

Coach Mike Clark noticed the lights and scoreboard from his perch in the K-State dugout, too, where things got a little nippy as temperatures dipped into the 20s and blustery winds made it feel even colder.

"It was a little chilly, but it was a beautiful

Spotty defense only blemish on Cats' sweep

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Mike Clark didn't sugarcoat his evaluation of K-State's defensive effort against Western Illinois on Sunday.

"Spotty," Clark said.

The Wildcats' 2-0 record after Opening Day was what Clark wanted, but the five errors that accompanied K-State's doubleheader sweep of the Leathernecks certainly weren't.

"We're not there yet," Clark said, "and we just need to play a lot more games and get a lot more practices out here to where they can be consistent and get some confidence with it."

Consistency wasn't part of the Cats' defensive repertoire Sunday.

K-State's middle infield – a four-player race for the team's everyday shortstop and second base positions – committed four errors, while game-two starter Kevin Melcher was saddled with another.

"They bothered me," Clark said, "but you can't do much about it during the course of the ballgame."

In fact, while Clark seemingly held his breath on each grounder up the middle, the 17th-year coach said he's confident the team's skills will improve with experience.

"It's just repetition, over and over and over doing it the right way. That's what they all need, and hopefully we can get outside, stay outside and keep playing."

Brandon "Boogie" Taylor, tagged with two errors while at shortstop in the first contest, said the problem might not be with skill.

"Those are pretty much all mental," he said. "We need to flush them, and not think about them. It's going to improve our game more if we just forget about them."

Taylor's replacement in the second contest didn't fare much better.

Newcomer Marc Chabot mishandled another ground ball at short in the nightcap, but said his struggles didn't stay with him long.

"You think about them, but if you don't make another error when the next one

STAFF AND WIRE REPORTS

K-State's 57th-ranked tennis team ran its winning streak to four with its second-straight shutout Saturday against Utah at Manhattan's Cottonwood Racquet Club.

The Wildcats took all six singles matches and swept the doubles competition as well to improve to 7-0 on the season. The loss dropped the Utes' record to 2-3.

K-State stayed undefeated in No. 1, No. 2 and No. 3 singles with wins from Petra Sedlmajerova, Maria Rosenberg and Jessica Simosa, respectively.

The Cats' double win was the team's fourth-consecutive as well.

Andrea Cooper and Simosa paired for an easy 8-1 decision over Utah's Rachel Alder and Hilary Doyle.

Women's basketball

No. 5 K-State was in its normal groove Saturday night against Oklahoma State. But the Wildcats almost found the touch too late against a pesky Cowgirl bunch.

Junior Nicole Ohlde led all scorers with 24 points to go with 11 rebounds, and sophomore Kendra Wecker pitched in 17 for K-State (23-2, 10-1), as the Wildcats pulled away in the second half, 64-46, in front of 13,340 at sold-out Bramlage Coliseum.

Oklahoma State (5-17, 1-10) scored the game's first eight points to make things interesting, as K-State missed its first nine attempts from the field.

A 10-1 run at the end of the half, interrupted only by Patterson's first technical foul of the season and Hawkins' ensuing free throw, gave the Cats their

His left knee felt great, his game was as sharp as ever. The real treat for Tiger Woods was holding another trophy at the Buick Invitational.

He didn't miss a beat during his time off from Dec. 12 surgery and, as usual, he had no problem with Phil Mickelson.

Woods was accurate off the tee and dynamite with his irons, closing with a 4-under 68 on Sunday for a four-shot victory at Torrey Pines.

Mickelson, who recently poked fun at Woods by saying he used "inferior" equipment, never challenged in the final group and finished six shots behind.

Still, his comeback fight with Clifford Etienne remains on — at least for now.

After a day of uncertainty, Tyson and his handlers decided Saturday not to pull out of his first fight since being badly beaten last June by Lennox Lewis.

Tyson's trainer, though, said he has no ticket for Memphis and doubts the fight will come off as planned.

SIMPSONS CELEBRATE 300

Show will become longest-running sitcom in TV history

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tanner Pikop travels from Manhattan to Springfield six nights a week.

He leaves campus and Aggieville behind and goes to the quiet city run by a crooked, over-sexed mayor and safeguarded by an inept, overweight police chief. In Springfield, nuclear power is king, and the same customers support the convenience store, local tavern and monorail.

Pikop, sophomore in architecture, leaves Manhattan for 30 minutes to visit his friends at 742 Evergreen Terrace.

"The Simpsons," the animated sitcom that has been airing on the FOX network since 1990, unites Pikop with millions of other viewers every Sunday night.

The 300th episode of "The Simpsons" aired Sunday night, marking yet another milestone for the family sitcom. By the time the show fulfills its newest contract, which will extend it through 2005, it will have passed "The Adventures of Ozzie and Harriet" to become the longest-running sitcom in television history.

"It's really intelligent humor," Pikop said, "even if it doesn't appear so on the surface."

Pikop said he has been familiar with the show since he was a child, but didn't begin to appreciate the humor until he was in high school.

"It's witty and satiric in its value of comedy," he said. "The originality really separates it from other sitcoms."

Richard Harris, professor of psychology, said the show is distinctive in many aspects, but also shares similarities with other family sitcoms.

The medium of animation allows for more over-the-top humor, Harris said, and the type of humor also sets the show apart from others.

"It's got an irreverent edge to it," he said.

"The Simpsons" has earned itself 18 Emmys and, most recently, its first Golden Globe nomination, according to a January press release from FOX.

Harris said that although the show's distinctive qualities have attracted various audiences, its sustained popularity probably relates to the similarities it shares with other sitcoms.

"It's looked at for entertainment," he said, "but also for a model of interaction. There's a strong interpersonal connectedness and model of family."

Character flaws and family loyalty are primary themes in "The Simpsons." Other sitcoms, such as "Friends," don't focus on biological families, but the theme of solidarity is prevalent in nearly all sitcoms.

Pikop said he appreciates many of the themes presented on the show, but is most impressed with the political satire and vast amount of knowledge displayed by the writers.

One of Pikop's favorite episodes involves Mr. Burns, the nuclear power plant owner, stealing a trillion-dollar bill from the U.S. government. Pikop said he found the episode humorous on the surface, but more intriguing when he realized the writers were providing commentary on foreign relations.

"There's a lot of stuff I pick up now that I probably didn't use to," Pikop said. "You see how smart the writers really are. It shows the writers' extensive knowledge of everything."

The writers and creators of the show have impressive résumés, Pikop said. "Late Night" host Conan O'Brien is a former writer, and executive producer James L. Brooks was involved in Oscar-winning movies such as "As Good as it Gets" and "Terms of Endearment."

One of the most distinctive characteristics of the show, Harris said, is its ability to tackle religion on a regular basis.

"It may be the most religious show on television," he said. "Conventional wisdom says religion is a touchy subject and can alienate viewers pretty quickly. But the show doesn't hesitate to take on religion or hypocrisy."

Harris said the Simpson family is possibly the only family on television that attends church on a regular basis. While some say the show provides a poor influence, Harris said it relates some Christian morals and principles without being preachy.

"It affirms that religion is an important part of that family's life," he said.

Pikop said the show has many layers to it, which helps to describe its appeal to such a large audience. He described himself as an avid viewer of the show, and enjoys quoting the show in conversation.

His only regret about "The Simpsons" is that he falls prey to the merchandising efforts. "The Simpsons" characters have endorsed Butterfinger and Burger King, along with a variety of memorabilia.

"I spend a lot more money than I should," Pikop said. "There's collector's stuff – games, books, posters, Pez dispensers – you see it, and have to have it."

Despite child pornography charges, R. Kelly flourishes on the charts

When R. Kelly was arrested on child pornography charges last year, some wondered whether it would be a devastating blow to his career.

The answer, so far, is a resounding no.

Despite being arrested on additional child pornography charges last month, the Grammy-winning singer has written a No. 1 song for the teen boy band B2K and scored his own hit with the sexually-charged "Ignition." The video for his song is one of the most requested on BET and has been on MTV.

comes to you, you're fine," he said. "You just don't think about it."

Chabot is the only true shortstop among the four players Clark will shop at the position. Taylor, Brett Williams and Jason Long – all natural second basemen – will also get a look, Clark said.

"We've still got a four-person infield in the middle, and they all have the potential to be really good defensively," Clark said.

With Creighton coming to town Tuesday for a mid-week tilt with the Cats, Clark is hoping that potential develops quickly and someone steps in soon to fill the defensive hole.

"We'll find out who's going to show up everyday and who's going to be consistent with the defense," he said.

"That's our focus right now – getting those guys, defensively, to be as good as they can be."

couple of innings."

The Cats' slump didn't result in a lack of scoring, however.

In the first contest, center fielder Brad Anzman picked up the Wildcats' first RBI in 2003 with a single to center.

Western would fight back to take the lead in the top of the third, but K-State moved back in front with four runs in the bottom half.

K-State buried Western with a five-run sixth that featured RBI from Brandon "Boogie" Taylor, Maloney, Doty, and Baldwin.

The Wildcats would add three more in the seventh and one in the eighth, as the Leathernecks were able to notch only two more runs in the contest.

The Cats banged out 32 hits during the day.

"Out of the chute and having not seen too much live pitching, we're excited about where they're at," Clark said.

Freshman Jared Bunn picked up the win for the Cats after going five innings and surrendering just two runs.

In the second contest, K-State took the lead with RBI doubles from Gabe Luttrell and Soto in the first inning.

But the Leathernecks answered K-State with a score in the second, two more in the third, and another in the fourth to go ahead 4-2.

K-State would have nothing of Western's insurrection, however, and reclaimed the lead with five runs in the fourth.

The Wildcats would add two runs in the eighth before taking the game 9-4.

Brett Bagley picked up the win for K-State, going four innings with seven strikeouts.

Baldwin led the way for K-State offensively, with eight RBI on the day. Soto drove in four, and Anzman plated three.

Doty, Clark said, needed to get himself healthier than Western Illinois looked after its run-in with the Wildcats.

"Tim's not feeling well at all right now," Clark said.

"The guy needs to go home, get some some soup, and get some sleep."

LIGHTS | The Frank flips lights on for season opener

night," Clark said. "This is a phenomenal facility. If you would have told me at any point in my career that we would have a facility like this at Kansas State, I would have told you you were lying. This is awesome."

That wasn't the feeling following the 1998 season, though, when ground was broken on the ambitious project.

The Cats played just seven home games during the 1999 campaign, all at Manhattan's Wayne Norvell Field. K-State went 7-0 during that stretch, and the Cats are anticipating similar success this season.

More recently than the Cats' season at Wayne Norvell Field, however, was controversy surrounding the stadium during the 2001 season.

A Saturday affair with defending Pac 10 Champion UCLA at The Frank on April 22, 2001, was suspended when it became to dark to play.

Thankfully, the Wildcats won't have to worry about that happening again.

"Coming to the yard, you know if we're going to last 10 or 11 innings, the lights are going to come on and we can keep playing," Maloney said.

The lights will come on a few more times this season. Eleven games are scheduled to start at 6 p.m. or later, including five during Big 12 play, which begins with Missouri at Tointon Stadium on March 28.

The weather should improve a little by then, Clark said, making baseball at K-State even more enjoyable.

"We're going to have a nice baseball team. I know we're going to have great competition, game in and game out, and it's a great atmosphere," Clark said. "I can't wait for the trees to blossom in left center and right center in April, because there isn't a prettier baseball field in America than Frank Myers Field."

ENLIST | Graduates offered rewards for serving

Bloomfield said.

They might want to serve their country. They might be intrigued by going overseas. But they don't want to commit for four years. Offer an option of about 19 months, DeGroat said, and the interest jumps.

"And these recruits would be a great asset to the military," DeGroat said. "College graduates can bring intellectual development to the services. The military is very sophisticated and technical. The nature of the mission of the military is very sensitive. We need someone who is rational and culturally-orientated to fulfill the task – college graduates fit that profile."

Now, the average enlistee is a high school graduate who signs up for a four-year hitch. Only about 6 percent of 18-to 24-year-old enlistees have college experience, according to a report by the Progressive Policy Institute.

"Almost all of the military equipment is high tech and computer generated," Bloomfield said. "We need people with experience to operate those things. You don't just pull a string and it fires. It takes some smarts."

However, the Department of Defense is not struggling for numbers. In fact, the department is coming off its most successful recruiting year ever.

"There is not a dire need to man the army," DeGroat said. "We are right on track with the needs of the nation. The military does not need this program to fill the ranks."

But if this program is an enticement, Bloomfield says, they will find ways to use the new recruits.

"We can certainly fit them in," he said. "This program will fall in line with other military enlistment programs. It gives a soldier a chance to get some training, some money to use towards their education and possibly even some traveling opportunities.

It really is a good program for soldiers who are just interested in a few years of service."

At the end of the 19-months, they will be required to serve two years in the active reserves and can be called to duty. Then they have the option of six years in a non-drilling reserve unit for national emergencies, or one or two years in a civilian service program such as the Peace Corps or AmeriCorps.

first lead with 49 seconds left in the half, and K-State rode the momentum to lead by as many as 18 and grab the Cats' 18th-straight win at home.

Men's basketball

Arthur Johnson followed one of his worst rebounding games with one of his best, grabbing 17 boards and scoring 14 points as No. 21 Missouri beat K-State 71-63 Saturday.

The Tigers (15-6, 6-4) are 12-0 at home, including five conference victories. They held Kansas State without a basket for more than 8 1/2 minutes down the stretch.

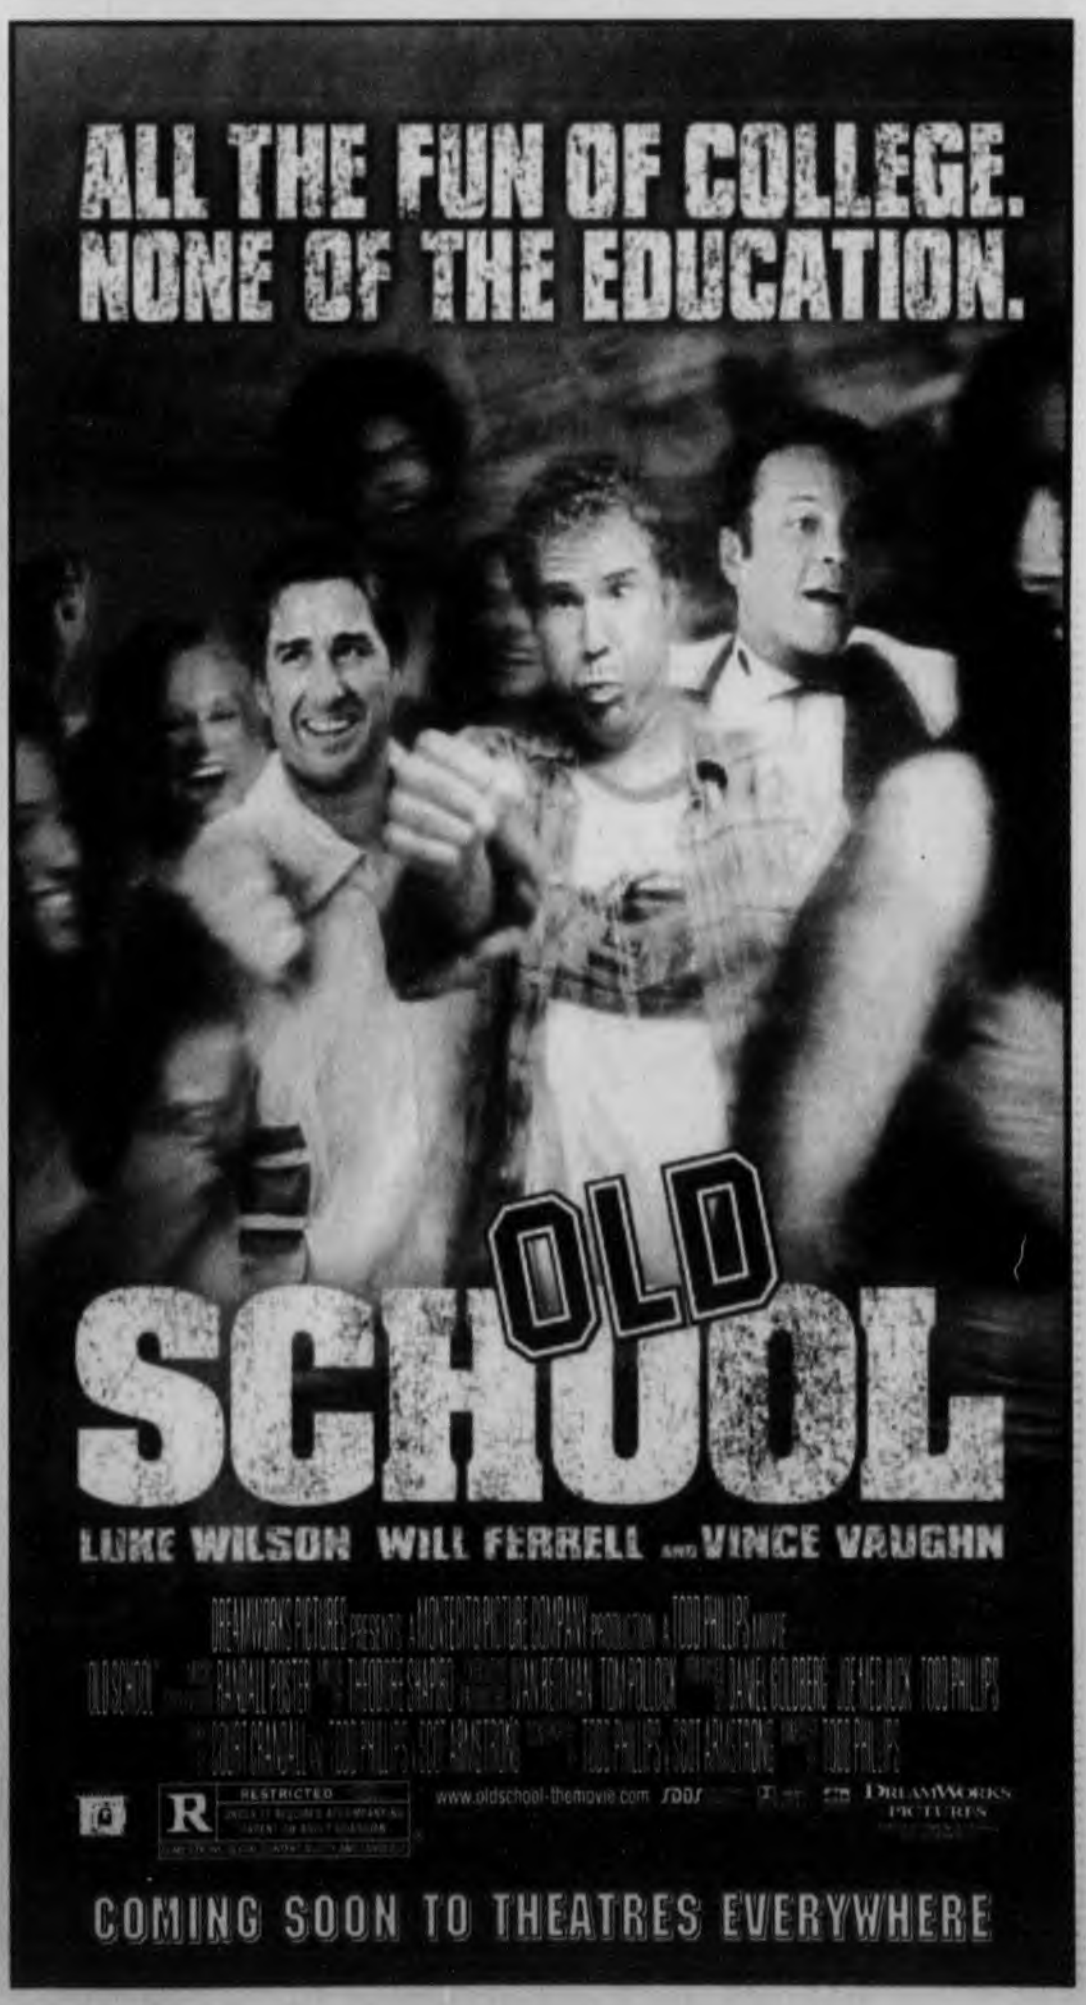
Frank Richards equaled his career best with 20 points for K-State (12-11, 3-7), which has lost five of its last six – four to Top 25 opponents. The Wildcats have dropped 13 straight Big 12 games on the road, a slump dating to last season, and 23 in a row on the road to ranked teams.

Track and field

Four-time national champion and K-State alumnus Nathan Leeper took the men's high jump on Friday at the Wildcat Power Classic at Ahearn Field House after setting the mark at 7 feet, 2 1/2 inches.

Karol Rovelto, wife of Coach Cliff Rovelto, cleared 6 feet, 2 inches to win the women's event Saturday.

The other half of the Wildcat track and field team was in Ames, Iowa, for the Iowa State Classic.



On Friday, Coby Cost broke the school record in the men's weight throw for the fourth time this indoor season with a 68-foot, 5 3/4-inch toss.

On Saturday, Kyle Lancaster and Mike Kizinkewich finished first and second in the men's high jump, clearing 7 feet, 1 inch to match the provisional-qualifying mark for the NCAA Indoor Nationals in March.

GAS | AAA encourages consumers to compare prices, limit consumption willing to jump to conclusions," said Nolan Fabricius, employee at Kwik Shop and freshman in fine arts.

Although it may be a while before consumers are hearing the sweet sounds of coins jingling in their pockets, Michael Oldfather, associate professor of economics, said prices might still be comparable to those during the mid 1970's.

"If you adjust for inflation, gasoline is still lower than it was 20 years ago," said Oldfather.

Meanwhile, Millard said AAA is urging drivers shop aggressively for gasoline, look around and keep track of who has the best prices.

AAA also advises motorists to limit fuel consumption. By running errands all at once rather than making several trips, drivers can conserve fuel.

Furthermore, gasoline wholesalers and retailers are encouraged to be aware of the pricing of gas in order to avoid panic pricing, according to AAA.

Price said. "He said all I had to do was show him the papers, and he withdrew me from school. The university took very good care of me."

Then, he had to make sure there was a replacement RA for his floor in Haymaker.

Price moved out of his room and is living out of a duffel bag in a friend's room.. While he thought he would graduate soon, he will have to wait another year.

"I initially was going to take three easy semesters so I could graduate in May 2004," he said. "Now, I am going to take a heavy load so I can graduate with my younger brother."

Price's father, Harry, came to Manhattan this weekend to take his son's belongings home to Springfield, Mo. He said they plan to test the e-mail system in order to keep in touch.

"We talk about it, pray about it and worry about it," Harry Price said.

Darrin Olson, a third-year veterinary medicine student, also had to withdraw from K-State to serve his country.

"I am going to get reimbursed, and they guaranteed me a spot when I came back," Olson said. "It was disappointing to have to leave college being so close to graduation, but I am honored to serve my country."

Olson's girlfriend, Heather Walker, had tears in her eyes as she stood with Olson as he shook hands with the commanding general.

"We were expecting it," she said. "I am just here to support him in anyway I can."

First Lt. Rick Souter, army chaplain, said fear and sadness are normal reactions.

"It's a natural reaction to talk about it with the people around you," Souter said. "Joy is shared and multiplied, but grief is divided."

With growing opposition to impeding war with Iraq, Souter said soldiers are not even listening to the protesters.

"If you voted, you have a right to be opposed to whatever action our government takes," he said. "We are doing what we've been called to do."

Gen. Michael Symanski, of the 89th regional support command, said that since the 450th transportation battalion will serve the Army's transportation needs, the length of its active duty is unknown.

"Transporting means you are the last ones to leave," he said. "There will come a day when your will be mission complete."

Col. George Harris reminded the soldiers it is not their job to fight, but to protect Americans.

"The purpose of the U.S. Army is not to fight and win wars," he said.

"Our primary objective is to prevent wars."

knew it was the right time and place – they just did.

"I just knew. You have a feeling," said Jonathan Simpson, Fort Riley resident, who married Lacey Porter, Manhattan resident, after knowing her for a month and a half.

Porter's father, Frank Porter, Beloit, said he found out two weeks ago his youngest child would soon be married.

"I try not to think about it," Frank said, as he waited for Lacey's and Simpson's turn with the judge.

"That's my baby. She's 19, 20 in June. She's old enough, I guess. She didn't ask my permission.

"But there wasn't no sense in arguing with her."

Most parents didn't argue with their children's decisions to wed on Friday.

Mitch Brack, graduate in mechanical engineering, and Tomoko Nobuta, graduate in horticulture therapy, said their parents knew they had planned to wed after being engaged for more than a year and didn't have a problem with their spontaneous choice of the day.

Brack's father called the cell phone while they waited, and Nobuta said she had e-mailed her parents earlier. Since Nobuta is from Japan, she said her traditional thinking of weddings is different, and she'd never been to a wedding in the United States before.

"I'm hoping I can say whatever the judge says," she said.

She said the number of weddings in one day didn't make her ceremony any less special.

"I think it's neat to know there are that many other people," she said.

District Judge Meryl Wilson performed the weddings, which started after office hours at 5 p.m.

Nine couples were scheduled to wed, but one failed to show. Wilson married all eight couples within an hour. It cost $50 for the judge's services and $75 for the marriage license.

Some wore the traditional wedding attire, while others dressed more casually. Some had several friends and family members attend, while others had only the two required witnesses.

"Some have friends, and some don't," Wilson said. "Some are dressed up, and some I've married in their cutoffs before."

Wilson said that during the six years he has been a judge, 10 marriages in one day hasn't been typical.

"An unusual day," he said. "It's one of the more fun things I do. As long as they don't mind waiting, I don't mind. I was going to try to accommodate everyone if they wanted."

The reason, he thought, for the high number of weddings was partly because Valentine's Day fell on a Friday and partly because those in the military may be deployed soon.

Chris Falls, Novak's friend and in his same unit at Fort Riley, said marriage can provide some security.

"Just in case, you know," he said.

"Something might happen to him."

When it was Novak and Morgan's turn to wed, 11 of their friends filed into the courtroom. Their two witnesses, whom they knew from high school, stood beside them as Wilson told them to join right hands. Morgan smiled and maintained constant eye contact with Novak while her friends ran from side to side across the room taking photos.

Wilson pronounced them husband and wife. They kissed, and Staci Novak said, "I love you" to her new husband.

As she walked out of the courtroom, she said she felt relieved and "very happy."

"It's going to be weird to write my name," she said, "but I've been practicing for quite a while now."

Leaders warn Iraq to disarm

U.N. inspectors call for more time, warn Iraq of "last chance"

By Barry Renfrew
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium – European leaders tried to mend their bitter dispute over Iraq on Monday by calling for more time for U.N. inspectors to disarm Iraq, but warning Baghdad it faced one "last chance" to disarm peacefully.

The declaration appeared to continue the division that has split the European Union, with France and Germany opposing any imminent military action against Baghdad.

The United States and Britain, its chief ally in the EU, are pushing for swift action to disarm Iraq, claiming that Saddam Hussein has no intention of complying peacefully.

France and Germany, who oppose war, appeared to emerge in a strong position Monday night after the EU statement backed more time for the U.N. weapon inspectors, without giving a deadline.

"They must be given the time and resources that the U.N. Security Council believes they need," the declaration said.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair said he was convinced that Iraq was already in breach of U.N. resolutions to disarm, but other EU nations appeared to need time to reach the same decision.

Blair also appeared to be backing away from a push for a second U.N. resolution to endorse military action against Iraq. He said the earlier resolution demanding Iraq disarm made a convincing case for tough action.

The leaders agreed that Iraq must disarm, but said "war is not inevitable." The declaration also recognized the Franco-German drive for a peaceful solution, calling war "a last resort."

"Baghdad should have no illusions. It must disarm and cooperate immediately and fully. The Iraqi regime alone will be responsible for the consequences if it continues to flout the will of the international community and does not take this last chance," the leaders said in a joint declaration.

Andrew Eager, junior in criminology and a nuclear, biological and chemical weapons specialist for the Army, listens to a speech given by President Bush. "I'm not really scared to be leaving, but I am scared for my friends and family, mainly because I can't do anything for them while I'm over there," Eager said.

AWAITING DEPLOYMENT

K-State junior puts life on hold upon news of mobilization

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Andrew Eager is trying to earn his place in America.

In the last week and a half, that has become more complicated.

Eager, a junior in criminology and a chemical weapons specialist in the U.S. Army, is preparing to be deployed, presumably to the Middle East.

He received mobilization orders Feb. 7 and is now waiting for the orders to come that he is leaving.

Since then, Eager has dropped all his classes, sold his car, packed up all his belongings and said goodbye to his family and friends.

It's tough, Eager said, but watching and doing nothing in a time when the world is in turmoil would be even harder.

"I know something needs to be done, and I know my job is to do it," Eager said. "That doesn't mean it's easy, though. It's so hard letting go of everything I have here."

He doesn't know where he is going. He's not entirely sure what he'll be doing. And he's not even certain how long he will be gone, although he thinks it will be a year.

What he does know, however, is that he is doing what is right for himself, his country and his fellow Americans.

Eager, 22, was born in South Africa. He didn't move to the United States until 1987.

His best friend, Brad Fura, senior in finance, said he respects Eager's decision to join the army – even more since he wasn't born in this country.

"I have total respect for all of our soldiers, especially Andrew, though," Fura said. "For someone who wasn't born here, wasn't even completely raised here to appreciate the freedoms we have so much and to want to defend this land, that's impressive. A lot of respect and thanks are owed to him and so many others."

Eager, however, said it was just something he always knew he wanted to do. The decision to join the army wasn't taken lightly, but it wasn't difficult. Most of his family has served in the military.

"I've just always seen it as our duty as a bigger, stronger nation to protect the world," Eager said. "I wanted to be part of that, because I believe in the idea. I really believe it's just my job as an American."

Eager's military accessories are the only things left in his already vacant room at University Commons.

SGA campaigns begin today

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today is the first day of campaigning for the 2003 Student Governing Association elections.

Campaign materials may be posted after 5 p.m. and must be removed by 7 p.m. March 6, according to the K-State elections regulations. Materials must comply with a list of rules set forth by Student Senate, said Bill Harlan, interim assistant coordinator of the Office of Student Activities and Services.

The regulations include stipulations, one of which requires that all posters must be attached at all four corners and may not exceed 16-by-22 inches. Posters must be tied to trees and lampposts.

Sidewalk chalk is permitted on sidewalks, but is not allowed on stairs or any areas not generally used for pedestrian walkways.

"Basically, the rules are there to make it as fair as possible," Mark Threeton, elections chair, said.

The election's rules differentiate between major and minor offenses, with major offenses including tampering with ballots, libelous or slanderous statements or conduct, and casting more than one ballot, among others.

Harlan and Threeton said there are no consistent infractions during campaigning, but that most offenses are accidental.

Election guidelines

Campaigning for the 2003 SGA elections begins at 5 p.m. today. Some basic regulations on campaign materials include the following:

- No chalking or outdoor hanging of posters is allowed in residence halls.
- Stickers shall be placed only on personal property.
- Chalking is permitted only on sidewalks, excluding stairs and any area not generally intended as a pathway for pedestrians.
- No individual shall remove, deface, obscure or tamper with campaign materials.
- No campaign activity may disturb or interrupt a class.
- Distribution of campaign materials must be made by an individual. Mass distribution, such as canvassing parking areas, leaving piles of campaign materials, sending junk e-mailings or scattering materials, is prohibited.

A complete list of rules for the elections is available on at www.k-state.edu/elections.

"Usually, it will just be having a sign posted in the wrong area or something like that," he said.

In the event of a minor offense, the candidate will be notified and then have three class days to resolve it.

Threeton said he expects some minor offenses, and some candidates could receive fines for infractions such as improper posting of materials or sending unsolicited e-mails.

SafeRide, Student Publications reviewed

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The SafeRide program could be implemented this fall if student senators approve a proposal presented to the privilege fee committee at its meeting Monday.

Voting totals from spring 2002 showed 2,692 students thought students would benefit from a SafeRide program, while 566 students disagreed.

The taskforce presented a plan which would contract out five cabs from Thursday through Saturday, from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m. As long as one person in the cab could show a student ID card, they could be taken to their Manhattan residence.

"We didn't want to deter students from not using the program by not allowing their non-student guests," Kohman said.

Gayle Spencer, student activities adviser, said the simple mission of the program is to prevent drunken driving.

It's more important to keep drunks from driving, she said, than to monitor the system so non-students don't use it.

The program, if passed, would be funded by a privilege fee, which would amount to $1.78 per student, per semester. The money would go toward a cab service contract of about $27 per hour for the four nights, a staff member who would work 15 hours on publicity and organization, and marketing expenses. The total cost of the program for a semester would amount to $35,483.

The task force did consider a sponsorship or grants to fund the program, but Kohman said this presented a big risk.

"This year, Coors could have sent us $35,000, but if they couldn't write that off the next year, the program would die."

"We wanted to make sure there's a guaranteed source of funding," Kohman said.

Also considered at the meeting was an increase in privilege fee for Student Publications Inc., which publishes the Collegian, Royal Purple yearbook and Campus Phone Book.

NEWS OF THE WEIRD

Man begins playing basketball 6 months after nearly losing head in traffic accident

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

Marcos Martin Parra, 18, hit the basketball court again in January, only six months after having his head nearly severed from his body in a traffic collision caused by a drunken driver. Parra's skull had been ripped from the cervical spine and neck ligaments, leaving the head fragilely attached, only by the spinal cord.

At St. Joseph's Hospital in Phoenix, Dr. Curtis Dickman performed first-of-a-kind surgery, which worked so well that Parra lost only about 5 percent of his neck's range of motion.

More top news

In January, an appeals court in Eidsivating, Norway, acquitted a 22-year-old cab driver, a Middle Eastern immigrant, of raping a woman who had the mental disorder Williams syndrome, because, said the court, he could easily have mistaken her overly friendly behavior (a characteristic of some people with the disorder) with a desire for sex.

The court said it also considered that the man had trouble with the language (despite 12 years in the country) and that some male immigrants believe that Norwegian women are easy.

Readers' choice

Joe R. Thompson, 18, was thrown 25 feet into the air in a car crash near Highway 40 and Woods Chapel Road in Blue Springs, Mo., in January, but survived when he landed among, and held onto, live overhead power lines.

Thompson remained conscious until rescuers arrived 20 minutes later and the electricity was shut off. He even made a cell phone call. (Fortunately for Thompson, the power lines were insulated.)

The prices of things

(1) Average fee per lawyer working on New York's portion of the 1998 multistate tobacco settlement (according to New York Supreme Court Justice Charles Ramos in October): $14,000 an hour.

(2) For permanent loss of her marital sex life for a 31-year-old Chinese woman (when her husband became impotent after a car crash, according to a Chinese court in October): the equivalent of $2,210.

(3) Amount Geneva Burger, 80, earned for uttering one question on an answering machine ("When people get hooked on pot, can they get sick if they don't get it?"): $515,000 (the amount awarded by a Pomona, Calif., court in December, and from prior settlements, as a result of rap producer Master P's using the recording without permission on an album).

Latest religious messages

Hemorrhoid-suffering pilgrims are trekking to the town of Murtosa, Portugal, to rub the affected body part against a statue of St. Goncalo, hoping for relief (since the the 13th-century priest was known for curing acne), according to a January report in the country's largest daily newspaper, Jornal de Noticias.

The Agri Gold Co. of Vijayawada, India, has begun marketing an instant, just-add-water version of the holy cow dung that many urban Hindus use in their purification rituals, according to a December dispatch from Kolkata, India, in the Sydney Morning Herald. (The dung sells for the equivalent of 25 cents to make about two pounds and is mixed with camphor, turmeric and sandalwood paste, which alleviates the foul smell, which is the main reason many Hindus had been leaving the dung part out of the ritual.)

Cultural diversity

Police in Johannesburg, South Africa, reported that 46 people in the Hillbrow district were injured during New Year's celebrations from the tradition of throwing items from windows and balconies; doing the most damage this year were several beds and television sets.

In December, the manager of Greenland's government hired an ethnic Inuit faith healer to "cleanse" government offices ("give the walls some fresh paint") in the capital of Nuuk, by "driv(ing) away the negative energy."

That was regarded as such nonsense by the non-Inuit political party that, on Jan. 15, the governing coalition collapsed. The manager said he hired the spiritualist as a bridging gesture to promote harmony and "the special Greenland spirit."

Latest trend in burglary

On Jan. 6, according to police in Prestonburg, Ky., Quinton G. Bailey, 20, was caught preparing to re-enter the apartment below his, by way of a hole in his floor (obscured by removable ceiling tile in that apartment); a box of that tenant's jewelry was found in Bailey's apartment.

On Jan. 27, according to police in Plainville, Conn., Jimmy Tran, 32, sawed through his own ceiling and the floor of the apartment above his and was caught by the female tenant after he had reached out and was dragging her purse along her floor toward the hole.

Least competent criminals

A January New York City indictment resulted in the arrest of alleged Colombo family mobster Joe Cacace as the central figure in a whacking gone bad.

Imprisoned family head Carmine "the Snake" Persico had ordered Cacace to rub out former federal prosecutor William I. Aronwald, whom Persico said had 10 years earlier disrespected him (although Aronwald had actually lost the case he brought against Persico's brother).

Cacace's hit men mistakenly whacked Aronwald's 78-year-old father, an error for which Cacace allegedly had them killed, along with the two men he had hired to kill those two men.

Cacace then married Kim Kennaugh, the widow of one of the original hit men, and after Cacace and Kennaugh divorced, Kennaugh married an NYPD officer, who himself got whacked (on Cacace's orders, prosecutors suspect).

Hoopingarner, Ehmke focus on 4 key issues outlining platform

Pair's term goals include online book exchange, more concerts

Eric Hoopingarner

Layton Ehmke

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

No slogans.
No T-shirts.
Just issues.

This is the foundation of Eric Hoopingarner and Layton Ehmke's campaign for student body president and vice president, respectively.

The pair have four main goals to outline their platform: an online book exchange, more concerts, more female athletic scholarships and a basketball game in Ahearn Field House.

Hoopingarner said the online book exchange, Sinapse, is an online marketplace that would be attached to the K-State Web site. He said it would offer an array of features to benefit students.

"It would be a student information portal. Offering information for buying and selling books, sports tickets, roommate information and many other things could be added," Hoopingarner said.

Ehmke said a benefit to the program is the ability to save money.

"This would save money and keep it simple, " he said. "All these issues are about taking money already allocated and getting more out of it."

Primary Elections

This is the second in a five-day series profiling, in alphabetical order, the platforms of the candidates running for student body president and vice president.

Primary elections will be Feb. 25 and 26.

The second issue is to bring a big concert each semester to Manhattan. Hoopingarner said they would fund the events from money allotted to the Union Program Council and student privilege fees.

The pair said they realize this may not be enough money, but said there could be other ways of raising the funds. Hoopingarner said raising student privilege fees a dollar would raise a considerable amount of money.

In addition, Hoopingarner and Ehmke said that Manhattan's location would not hinder the ability to get good bands.

"We are right between Kansas City and Denver," Ehmke said. "The only reason we haven't got anyone is because no one has asked – we're asking."

Their third issue includes moving the K-State men's basketball game against the University of Kansas from Bramlage Coliseum to Ahearn Field House. Hoopingarner said this is based on opinions they have heard from students, basketball players, alumni and fans.

"We need to do something to bring back the mojo," Ehmke said.

One concern about moving the game is that Ahearn Field House would only seat about 8,000 people. Hoopingarner said the KU game is already separated from the current student ticket package, so they would just like to make it something special for students. It would be free with a student ID. He said the game should just be for students.

The final issue the pair plans to address is K-State's lack of compliance with Title IX. Hoopingarner said according to the regulation, colleges are supposed to offer scholarships based on the proportion of students. He said K-State now offers about 43 percent of its scholarships to females but should be offering around 52 percent.

Ideas to increase the scholarships include giving more scholarships to current women's teams or adding more female sports. Hoopingarner said adding women's soccer would be beneficial because K-State already has the facilities and a good club team.

"Our club team already plays KU." Hoopingarner said. "We are about the only college in the Big 12 who doesn't offer it."

To comply there would have to be some changes in the budget, but Hoopingarner said he would not advocate cutting a male sport. However, there may be some scholarships that need to be rearranged in order to meet the regulation.

All of these goals can be attained, Hoopingarner and Ehmke said. In addition they said they would welcome students' ideas and give students more outlets to offer input into student government.

Ehmke and Hoopingarner said they know there may be some barriers in achieving their goals, one being getting elected. Hoopingarner said there are some things voters should evaluate about their campaign.

"Our campaign is about looking past stereotypes," he said. "It is not about how much you spend on the campaign, or what you give away, or where you live. It is about the tangible issues we have that are worthwhile for students."

2 students finalists for Truman scholarship

Students selected as scholars to receive $30,000 reward

By Wendy Lynn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two of K-State students were recently named as finalists for the Harry S. Truman Scholarship. If selected, the two will be awarded $30,000 to pursue a master's degree leading to a career in public service.

Mindi Russell, senior in food science, and Sarah Ashley, junior in political science and criminology, will interview with other candidates from Kansas, Arkansas and Missouri for the scholarship.

Russell's area of interest is food safety. She hopes to pursue a master's degree of public service at Texas A&M and eventually work at the USDA or FDA improving food safety. Her interest in food safety was sparked while working in the K-State food microbiology laboratory.

"I just want to make a difference," Russell said. "Decreasing food pathogens will increase food safety for consumers."

Ashley plans to become a federal judge one day. After K-State, she plans to receive a master's of science degree in the United Kingdom and then a law degree. Her interests include educational law and improving welfare through education.

"I got to combine my two passions – education and law. I want to help with education advocacy programs," Ashley said.

Ashley said the faculty has been a big help by writing letters of recommendation and having mock interviews.

"Applying for the Truman really makes you research and decide what you are interested in," Russell said. "A lot of work goes into the process, and it's hard to narrow down your interests and desires."

The application process started about one year ago for the two. They both submitted campus applications last spring, and the pool of K-State students was narrowed down to four.

This group then submitted applications to the national foundation in January, and finalists were announced this month. Applicants wrote a 500-word policy proposal that stated a problem, outlined a solution and also identified obstacles.

Originally, there were about 600 students that applied nationally, and now there are 212 remaining. About 70 students will be awarded scholarships.

"We nominate our students earlier so they have more time to prepare," scholastic advisor, James Hohenbary said. "The campus application is almost identical to the national application."

Truman scholarships can be used for both the senior year and in graduate studies. Of the total amount, $3,000 goes to the student's senior year, and the remaining money is used for graduate school.

To be eligible, recipients must be U.S. citizens and graduate in the top quarter of their class. They also must be pursuing a career with the government or in the nonprofit sector. Applicants are selected based on their leadership potential and communication skills.

K-State ranks first among all public colleges in producing Truman scholars with 25 winners. The scholarship program began in 1977, and K-State had its first winner in 1980.

"We have excellent student leaders, good faculty willing to work with students, and a strong focus on campus willing to get the word out," Hohenbary said.

American U-2 plane flies in support of U.N. inspection

By Hamza Hendawi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq – An American U-2 surveillance plane made its first flight over Iraq on Monday in support of the current U.N. inspection mission, marking another concession by Saddam Hussein's regime to stave off a U.S.-led attack.

Meanwhile, Iraqi state television broadcast scenes of Iraqi troops in maneuvers to defend the country from a possible U.S. attack. State television also said Saddam praised last weekend's anti-war protests, singling out those in Italy, Spain and Britain whose governments support the strong U.S. position against Baghdad.

The U-2 flight took place only one week after the United Nations and Baghdad broke an impasse that had kept the reconnaissance plane grounded since the start of inspections in November. The Iraqis agreed to allow U-2 flights last week, fulfilling a major demand by U.N. inspectors seeking to determine if Iraq still harbors weapons of mass destruction.

"At 11:55 a.m., a U-2 surveillance plane entered Iraqi airspace and reconnoitered several areas of Iraq and left Iraqi airspace at 4:15 p.m.," the Iraqi Foreign Ministry said in a statement. "The reconnaissance operation lasted 4 hours and 20 minutes."

The statement did not indicate the plane's flight path.

"A U-2 did fly today," said Ewen Buchanan, the New York-based spokesman for the chief inspector Hans Blix. "It's about time, too. We've been trying to do this for quite a while and we hope that the other reconnaissance aircraft and drones will be up and running shortly, thereby increasing our capabilities."

Iraqi officials had objected to the U-2 flights, contending they couldn't guarantee the safety of the plane if it was flying over Iraq at the same time as U.S.-British air patrols in the "no-fly zones" of northern and southern Iraq. Unless those warplanes were kept out of the sky during the U-2 flight, the reconnaissance craft might be targeted by anti-aircraft fire, they said.

The no-fly zones were declared by Washington, without U.N. authorization, to protect dissident Iraqi Shiite Muslims and Iraqi Kurds from Saddam's forces. The Iraqis consider the zones to be illegal.

It was not immediately clear whether the United Nations met conditions requested by the Iraqis in order to let the U-2 flights pass unimpeded.

Gen. Hossam Mohamed Amin, the chief Iraqi liaison officer to the U.N. inspectors, had asked Blix to give Baghdad data on the flight before it entered the country's airspace, including the plane's call sign, its altitude, speed and time of arrival.

Iraq had asked for similar conditions for U-2 flights that occurred after the 1991 Gulf War, but had relented and permitted the flights to go forward.

Baghdad is under strong pressure from the United States to cooperate with U.N. weapons inspectors or face attack. The United States and Britain reject Iraqi claims to have abandoned all weapons of mass destruction.

On Monday, U.N. inspectors visited six missile sites – including one involved in a rocket system the United Nations has banned.

Blix told the U.N. Security Council on Friday that U.N. missiles experts "concluded unanimously" that two versions of Iraq's Al Samoud-2 missile could exceed the 94-mile range limit set by the United Nations – and were therefore banned.

Under U.N. resolutions adopted after Iraq's defeat in the 1991 Gulf War, all banned weapons must be destroyed.

U.N. inspectors have since been marking the banned Al Samoud missiles. A spokesman for the inspectors, would not say if the inspectors intended to destroy them – only that they were tagging the rockets as "a way of monitoring" them.

TO THE POINT

SafeRide fee should be top Senate priority

SafeRide has been talked about for a long time, a vote has been taken and now it could be implemented as early as this fall.

The SafeRide taskforce has developed a detailed plan including contracts with cab companies, hours of operation and program costs. If passed, students will pay for the program for less than $2 a semester and will get a ride home just by showing their student ID.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

This program is valuable in keeping students who have been drinking from harming others. The taskforce has done a thorough job and created a program that will prove successful.

The privilege fee committee should author legislation to present to Student Senate that will fully fund this program. Of all the fees that the committee members consider this semester, SafeRide should be considered among the top priorities.

Two dollars a semester is a small price to pay for saving students' lives.

GLORIFIED VIOLENCE

Illustration by Jeff Yeung | COLLEGIAN

Video game exemplifies society's biggest fears

LINDSEY PRAECHTER

I like video games, even some of the violent ones. I have played many video games that glorify violence, but "Grand Theft Auto: Vice City" tops them all combining cruelty, violence and offensiveness into virtual-reality gaming.

"Vice City" glorifies everything society hates – theft, assault, murder and prostitution. Obviously your point total doesn't decrease as you break all of the laws above. In fact, in "Vice City," when you pick up a prostitute, your life increases.

The storyline is based around an implied drug deal that is referenced by getting the "merchandise" that is "100 percent Colombian." There are so many things in this game that are so wrong that it is rated "M" for mature.

"Vice City" is advertised frequently on television, appealing to kids and adults alike. The advertisements play catchy 1980s songs with the main character stealing cars and pointing guns at people.

Looking strictly at the title or even at the ads, the game doesn't reveal its full violent potential. So, you go around stealing cars and shooting people. What video game or cartoon doesn't involve some violence?

The game does demand skill by providing different parts of the city to learn and missions to complete. Many involve hitting the occasional pedestrian or fighting off the FBI, when you have committed enough crimes to provoke them, but that's the price a car thief and fugitive has to pay.

Many of the Play Station 2 owners that are of age are addicted to this game, or the four other "Grand Theft Auto's" that precede it. There is nothing wrong with that. I have to admit that I find this game remarkable.

Even as a firm law-abiding citizen, I enjoy creating some havoc strictly on video gaming basis. This game gives the cheap thrill of crashing cars and hitting jaywalkers with no reality-based consequences.

"Vice City" seems to encapsulate all genres of video games into one. Being able to randomly steal a car on the street or go up and punch any pedestrian that looks at you wrong is exciting for most PS2 addicts or novices. The gamer gets the fast cars of racing games and the untamed violence of fighting games combined to create the most amoral game I have ever played, but excitement nonetheless.

This is a fantasy world with resource after resource to let pent up anger out or to just relax with. As an adult, purchase and enjoyment of "Vice City" is fine.

Adults understand the implications of the crimes in reality and can separate a video game's world from their own. I cannot say that it is the same for children.

Violence is relative. Some children grow up seeing auto theft or prostitutes on the street, but role-playing this at any age younger than 18 is unacceptable.

If you are an adult with a refined taste in video-gaming potential, "Vice City" is for you. "Vice City" can be found in many habitats of college students and other gaming adults, and it is held dear to their gaming hearts. This is understandable and can provide countless hours of virtual violent behavior that is best taken out on a video game amongst friends.

Black, white or just weird, Jackson remains King of Pop

PAUL RESTIVO

I am obsessed with Michael Jackson.

What exactly I am obsessed with is ambiguous even to me. Is it the evolution of the nose, the skin color, the dancing or the weird obsession he has for children? I don't know.

Bottom line, though – Jacko is a weirdo. Love him or hate him, he's nothing less than freakin' strange. The question is how he ended up this way.

In 1979, the 21-year-old heartthrob, then a young black man, was heating the airwaves with Jackson 5 hits. It was at this period in his life that his father labeled him "Big Nose." And so the evolution of the face began.

Though it is not clear how many nose jobs the 44-year-old King of Pop has had, he claimed in an interview aired on VH1 that he had only had two that he "could remember." The first, though, seemed to have happened in 1984, at the peak of "Thriller."

In 1985, his nose changes again. He also is seen wearing lipstick in public. Slowly, he starts to resemble Freddie Mercury.

The beginning of the end of the black Jacko comes in 1987. At age 29, Jacko looks more like Paula Abdul than Paula Abdul. He frightens the public because his nose has changed again, he suddenly has cheek bones, and his skin color goes from cocoa bronze to fish-belly white. He blames this on a skin condition called vitiligo, which creates blotches of skin that lack pigment.

He also is accused of taking female hormones to keep his voice at a 12-year-old range, sounding absurdly similar to Marilyn Monroe. It is at this stage that we realize Jacko "has issues."

In 1991, Jacko looks like his sister LaToilet Jackson. He now has a new nose, different cheeks (again), a new cleft in his chin, and a different lip color every week. Jacko uses the vitiligo card again in defense of his appearance, although vitiligo has nothing to do with pink lips, a cleft in the chin, or any other plastic surgery. But hey, he had a bad childhood. Come on.

Pepsi and L.A. Gear cancel their contracts with Jacko in 1993 because he's too scary looking. He also is charged with sexually molesting children. Jacko then begins his second career as a first-class whiner. The nose is apparently "dead" after too many surgeries. Jacko doesn't sue.

Jacko's cheese slides off the cracker in 1997 when he suddenly has a bigger jaw line than Superman in DC Comics. Cosmetology must not be a science on his Neverland ranch.

Today, with what appears to be a new chin, cheeks, nose, and eyebrows (and a frightening goatee), Jacko resembles a cross between Liz Taylor, Liza Minelli and the Crypt Keeper. He hasn't been as popular since he called Sony Records executives racists for not promoting his album enough. What?

Despite the transformation from black to white, defended in Jacko's hit song "Black or White," he still remains the King of Pop and irresistible to society.

What is it about him that makes women fall into his arms or cry upon meeting him? Though it could be out of fear, I'm thinking not.

I, too, love Jacko. Nobody has donated more time to children, charity and the betterment of the world than Jacko.

Jacko is not a molester. He is not a pervert. Neither is he a woman.

Jacko is just a genuinely nice human being, whatever color he may be, and it's hard for society to accept him as such. Nobody in the celebrity world is perfect. Nor will a celebrity not be slandered by the media.

Jacko suffers the worst because he is too rich, he is too weird looking, he loves children, he lives in a place called Neverland, and he plays with a monkey. With his childhood and with the world we live in today, can you blame him? I can't.

Just as he was in 1984, Jacko is the world's King of Pop.

He just doesn't have a nose now.

Majority of recent graduates employed

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Graduates who are feeling nervous about finding a job may find encouragement in a recent study.

Of those participating, 66 percent of K-State graduates from August 2001 to May 2002 are employed, Career and Employment Services reported.

Of the unemployed, 20 percent are furthering their education in graduate school, and only 10 percent have reported that they still are seeking employment.

"K-State has one of the most extensive follow-ups of graduates that I have seen at any campus," said Kerri Keller, associate director of Career and Employment Services.

"It ranges from sending surveys via e-mail and post to call nights for different colleges," she said. "There is also a place on the Web site where students can report their status, and we ask that employers report hires to us."

One of these graduates found a job very close to home.

Megan Christensen, admissions representative for K-State, graduated in May 2002 with a degree in secondary education with an emphasis in art.

Though it's not teaching, Christensen said she is happy with her current position.

Christensen said she heard about the position while working for the student alumni board.

"I applied and went through the interview process. This wasn't what I originally intended to do," she said.

"I was also looking for a teaching position, but this was something that I'd had in the back of my mind for a while, and it just worked out."

K-State prepared her for postgraduation, Christensen said.

"Being in the position that I am, one outside of my degree area, shows that I was prepared for anything," she said.

Another member of the spring 2002 graduating class, Doug Miller, has a success story of his own.

Miller, who graduated with a degree in mechanical engineering, now works for Williams Gas Pipeline in Owensboro, Ky.

Miller interviewed with Williams on campus and had a job lined up in January 2002.

"They were hiring out in the eastern part of the country," he said. "I wanted to get out there because I have a lot of friends and family in that area."

Miller, who was a member of Pi Kappa Phi fraternity and the president of the Society of Automotive Engineers his senior year, said he also thinks K-State has a lot more than academics to offer graduating students.

"There are many ways for students to excel and be involved," he said.

A big trend with employers is to use internship programs as a way to recruit, Keller said.

"The academic departments overall place a tremendous emphasis on students getting experience while attending school. That includes internships, co-ops, student-teaching and even volunteering."

K-State has a program where students can post their resumes online for a fee, Keller said.

"Go ahead and put your resume out on the Web. You can pay to have it sent out to recruiters, and it's well worth the cost to do that," Miller said. "It shows the recruiters that you are actively seeking employment, and they like that."

Christensen said students should take these opportunities seriously.

"Take everything that you're doing right now seriously and think about how it affects you, because it will help you out later in life," Christensen said.

"Everyone you meet here has the possibility of helping you out in the future, whether it's a reference or a connection. Networking is very important.

"Also, stay positive. A lot of graduates are really worried about where they're going to end up. Everyone will end up in a spot where they're happy eventually. It just may take a little longer than expected."

Student creates network filter

System blocks peer-to-peer file-sharing exchanges, reduces costs for K-State

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN
Josh Ballard, senior in computer science, works in the basement of Hale Library as a computer technician. He created software that blocks file-sharing for K-State.

Students found a number of changes when they came back to school this past fall, including their ability to use peer-to-peer file-sharing applications to exchange music, movies and software on the Internet.

Josh Ballard, senior in computer science, created the software that blocks those exchanges.

Ballard, a Computing and Network Services employee, created a network-filtering software system that dramatically reduced the amount of Internet bandwidth used by K-State, which in turn reduced K-State's costs significantly.

Ballard said the peer-to-peer file-sharing applications were creating stress on the system, which was limiting people's abilities to do research and academic work.

"Our Internet connection was essentially full. We couldn't get anything out or in," Ballard said. "People who needed to do things that were essential to the university weren't able to do their jobs."

Ballard said his software can identify peer-to-peer applications as well as malicious content traveling through the network. When the software identifies these types of packets, it either drops them or returns them to the sender, saying the connection is no longer valid.

Besides relieving stress on the system, Ballard's system also saves K-State more than $100,000 a year on extra Internet service, Harvard Townsend, director of CNS, said.

"K-State already pays about $400,000 per year for Internet1 and Internet2," Townsend said. "If Josh's system wasn't in place, we would probably have to double the amount of Internet service we buy."

The software also allows students in the residence halls to have better network performance than before it was in place, Townsend said.

He said that early in fall 2002, the residence hall networks were completely saturated, which caused slow performance. Because of this, students had trouble accessing anything on the Internet both off and on campus.

"The problem was entirely due to students in the residence halls using peer-to-peer file sharing applications like KaZaA, Morpheus and Gnutella to exchange copyrighted and licensed music, movies and software," he said. "Once Josh's system was put in place to block those exchanges, the network performance improved dramatically for both on-and off-campus access. The network once again became usable."

John Posten, who said he'd be downloading songs from KaZaA at least once a day if he could, said he can see both the good and bad aspects of Ballard's system.

"On one side, the students pay $150 for their personal Internet access and then find out that they can't use their favorite Mp3 downloading program after they've already paid," he said.

"On the other side, you have the university, which is giving students a pretty good deal on broadband Internet access, and doesn't possibly have enough bandwidth for everyone to be downloading movies from KaZaA. If students were allowed to download, it would slow it down significantly for everyone else, including themselves."

Townsend said the system also helps to reduce the number of legal complaints K-State receives for violations of the Digital Millennium Copyright Act. Groups such as the Recording Industry Association of America and the Motion Picture Association of America contact CNS when they find violators of the act at K-State.

"One major U.S. public university said recently they deal with an average of 200 such legal complaints a month," Townsend said. "K-State only deals with about one per month because of Josh's system."

Ballard said he's been interested in this type of system for around 3-1/2 years.

"I had a generic interest in the Internet and how things worked," he said. "Then I had a computer that got hacked, and that got me interested in security."

Ballard said his system isn't designed to detect e-mail viruses but does identify and stop malicious content that could compromise a person's computer.

He said he has been working on the system constantly for the past three years and received help from online groups of people interested in the same types of technology he was.

"I'm not going to say it's all original, because it's not," Ballard said. "I built on some others' ideas and threw in some original stuff, and that's kind of where it came from."

Creighton (0-1) vs. K-State (2-0)

Brad Anzman has been a backup; he doesn't want to be one again.

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Brad Anzman came to K-State in 2001, he was immediately a backup.

In front of Anzman was Kasey Weishaar, K-State's single-season batting average record holder.

Anzman saw action in 23 games and started seven times that season. He posted a .175 batting average, scored five runs on seven hits and had two RBI.

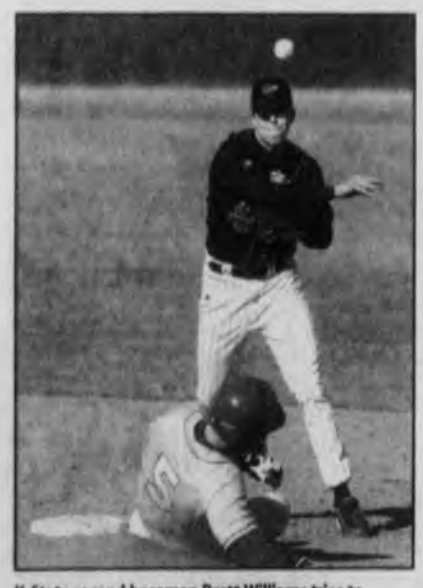
Last year, Anzman competed with Pat Maloney, Nick Sorensen, and Gabe Luttrell for one of the outfield positions – he didn't win one.

He saw action in 26 games and again had seven starts. He posted a .229 batting average, scored nine runs on 11 hits, and drove in eight.

Anzman wasn't satisfied with being a backup, so he worked at becoming a better ballplayer.

"I would say I've changed quite a bit in the last two years," he said. "I've been edging to get in that lineup, and I've been waiting for my time. And I've learned a lot, baseball wise, knowledge wise, everything.

"I came out this year after wanting to get that spot the last two years, worked hard and just relaxed and had fun. The things that are out of my hands I can't control. And that's playing time. All I can control is the way I play."



This season, Anzman

Cats begin tough schedule

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Strength of schedule isn't just for football teams trying to get into BCS games – it also plays a part in determining college baseball's NCAA Tournament field.

Creighton and K-State – two teams that fully understand that fact – will meet at 3 p.m. today at Tointon Family Stadium.

After a Big 12 Tournament run last year, K-State (2-0) will play 11 games against NCAA teams from last season. Creighton (0-1) improved its schedule, too, in hopes of earning a postseason bid this year. The Bluejays will play 21 games against 2002 tournament teams.

Coach Mike Clark said Creighton is similar to the Wildcats in that respect.

"They've got most of their kids back from last

Statistical comparison

Creighton's lone loss came to Arkansas, a team K-State will see later this season. Here's how the teams stack up for today's afternoon affair at Tointon Family Stadium.

.261	Opponent's batting average	.324

Win will top off Cats' hot start

Could things have gone better for K-State's baseball team on Sunday?

A glance at the statistics from a two-game sweep of Western Illinois says maybe.

You'll have to look past the 23 runs and 32 hits the Wildcats hung on the Leathernecks, though.

True, K-State compiled a lofty .410 batting average for the weekend, while holding Western to a .261 mark. The Cats also averaged 8 1/2 strikeouts per contest from the mound.

DAN SMITH

But K-State left 23 runners on base and committed five errors in the field that led to two unearned runs.

But there were plenty of encouraging performances from the weekend as well. To wit:

Offense

Ryan Baldwin went 4-for-10 at the plate with two doubles and eight RBI.

Baldwin likes the Cats' Tuesday opponent, too. Last April against the Bluejays, Baldwin hit two home runs and tallied nine RBI to cap a 4-for-5 effort.

Pitching

Seminole State Junior College transfer Brett Bagley impressed in his first outing as a Wildcat.

The left-hander struck out seven and surrendered only two hits in four innings of relief work get the win in the second game.

Bagley is competing for a starting spot in the Cats' rotation, and if Sunday was any indication, the junior now could be among the frontrunners.

Defense

Third baseman Ty Soto struggled on the field in 2002, leading the team in errors with 29.

On Sunday, Soto was a perfect 4-for-4 defensively.

That's no surprise, considering the improvements he made during fall drills. In three starts during the Fall Ball World Series, and recorded seven putouts and two assists.

If K-State's middle infielders can recover the way Soto has, the Cats will be tough to beat.

For now, though, they top the list of players needing improvement.

The list

Brandon "Boogie" Taylor isn't a natural shortstop, so his two errors are understandable.

Marc Chabot was tagged with another error in the second contest, too, and Brett Williams, Clark's other option at the position, committed an error at second base as well.

Senior pitcher Kevin Melcher gave up six hits and two earned runs in just 3 1/3 innings.

Melcher is the Cats' No. 1 starter entering the season, but Western Illinois had no problem solving his attack Sunday.

A new lineup will take the field this afternoon for the Cats' contest with Creighton.

The Cats will start newcomer Jim Ripley on the mound.

Another win for a young pitcher and a 3-0 start to the season would be a tough start to beat.

Intramural games continue; teams reaching critical juncture

Basketball teams have chance to continue or start winning seasons

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The intramural basketball program is reaching a do-or-die point in the season.

With every team having played two or three games, each team still has a chance to either continue its winning ways or turn its season around.

Josh Ibel, senior in construction science and management and captain of the independent Unisonics (3-0), said he is enjoying the season but is looking forward to the playoffs.

"It's fun, but it'll be better when the playoffs come and we can beat some better quality teams," Ibel said.

For other teams, the most important part of the season isn't winning, but enjoying the game of basketball.

This is the case for LCA, an independent squad composed of members of Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity. The fraternity has both an independent team and a 6-foot-and-under team named LCA. The 6-foot-and-under team has yet to win a game.

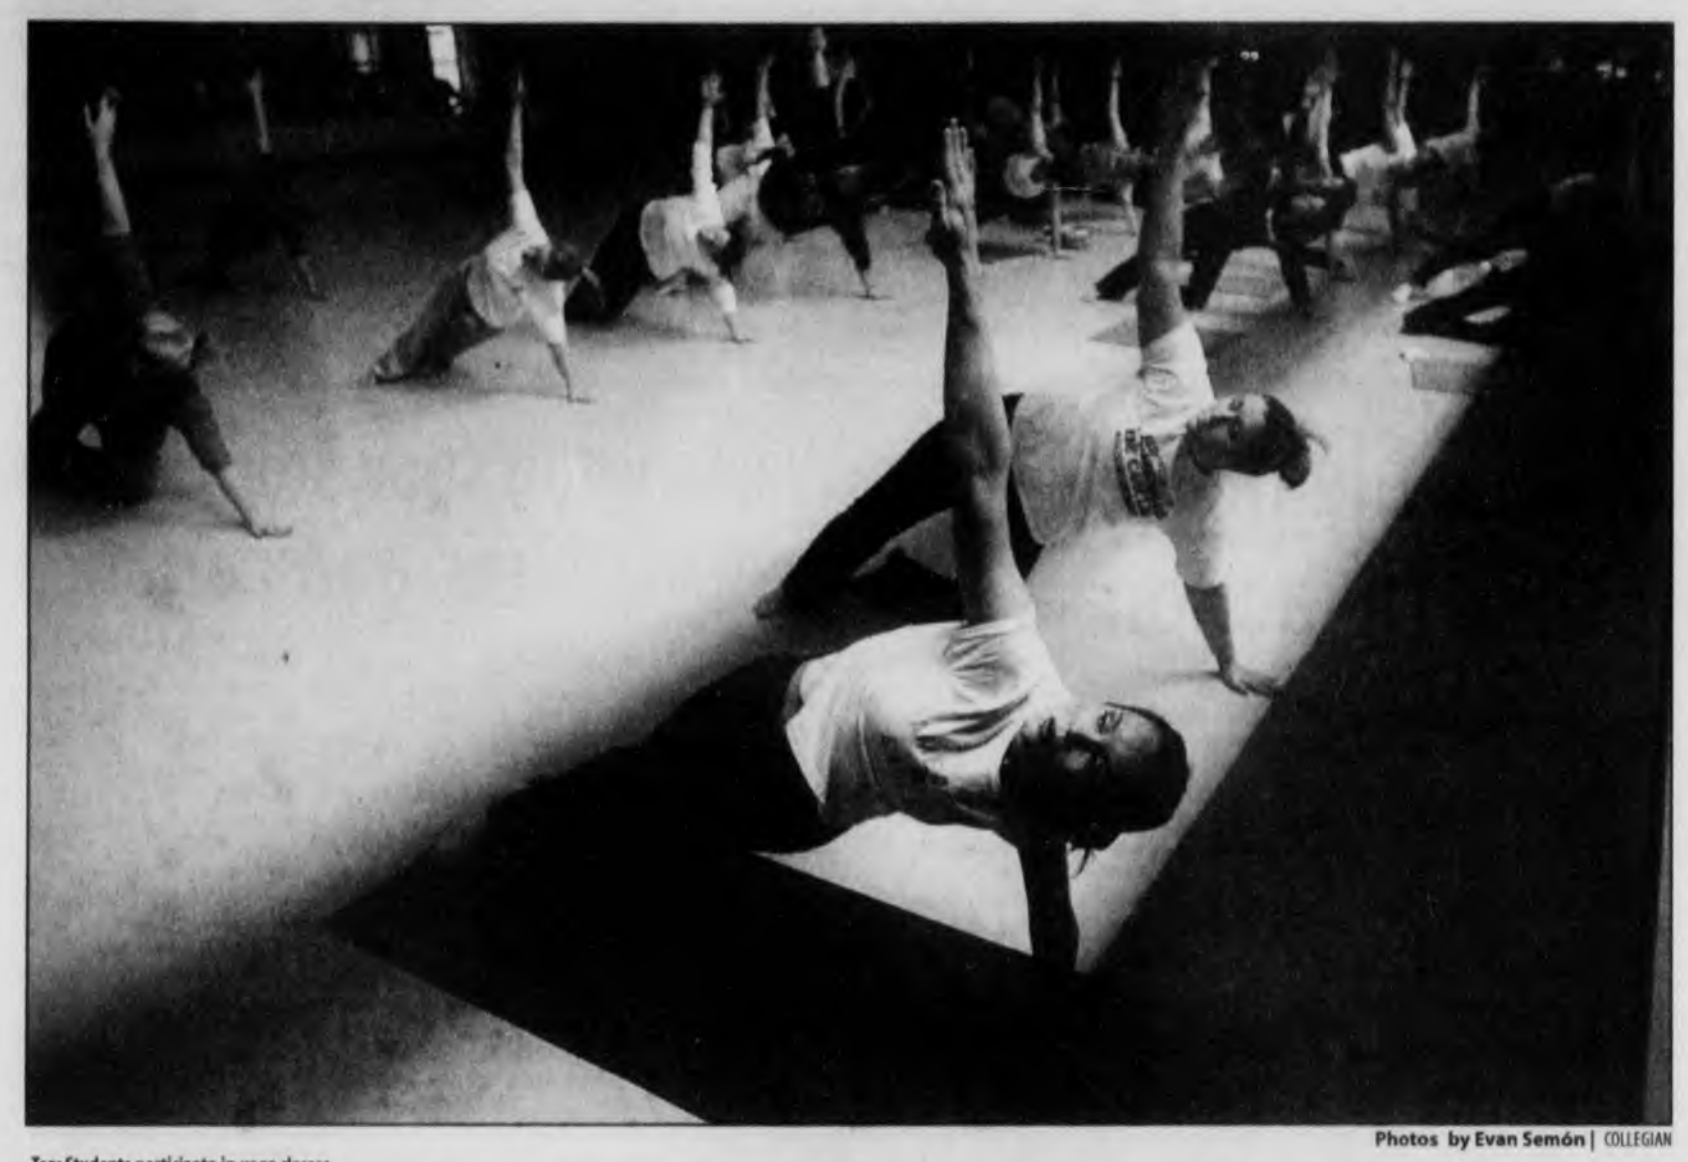
Jason Heine, junior in business administration and captain of both squads, said enjoyment of the game is the team's top priority.

"We just put a team together to go out and have fun," Heine said.

"We're not trying to be competitive. We just have fun playing basketball."

Another winless squad, Team 1 (0-2), is focusing on regrouping and trying to win some games.

"We're trying to organize some practices, and we're trying to implement some defenses and offenses," said Brian Friesen, freshman in business administration and captain of Team 1.



Practice is one way a team can get better. Ibel said members of his team play pickup games at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex on a regular basis, but don't have any formal team meetings.

"Most of our team plays at the Rec three to four times a week," Ibel said.

"We don't prepare as far as sitting down and talking about it."

STRETCHING THE MIND

Yoga uses meditation, balance to strengthen muscles

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kate Menke stretches on the cool floor of a dark, candle-lit room and tries to relax after a long day of classes. She's not preparing for a nap – she's exercising.

Menke, sophomore in interior architecture, joins about 80 other yoga students each week at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex as they quietly bend, twist and strengthen muscles. Menke has been attending yoga classes at the Rec Complex for more than a year.

"I practice yoga to keep myself in shape and to release stress," she said. "It definitely balances things out for me. You can improve your mood just by doing yoga."

Deanna Scherman, senior in music education, teaches yoga classes at the Rec on Sunday and Thursday nights. She said yoga uses relaxation, balance, flexibility and meditation to strengthen and tone muscles.

"It focuses a lot more on the mind and body connection and being aware of how the body feels as you challenge the body in different poses," she said. "During the different poses we do, although it's slow, you're using that mental connection to support the body."

Scherman said yoga is a low-stress way to tone muscle. She said there isn't any loud, heart-pumping music or props involved, just one's body weight – which could be why her class is consistently one of the largest offered at the Rec Complex.

"It's more of a reflective time," she said. "Not to say it's not challenging – it can be very challenging – but it's a lot more low stress, with relaxing music in the background. It's just a different experience."

It's an experience that can differ with each instructor, Scherman said.

"There are a lot of different types of yoga that people will teach. Somebody could come to my class and absolutely love it and go to another class and not like it, or vice versa," she said. "Yoga can be like a deeply spiritual or meditative experience for someone, or it can just be a physical experience – the level you take it to is completely up to you," she said.

Ana Franklin, yoga instructor at University For Mankind, said she began teaching a meditative form of yoga 18 years ago.

"Yoga has been a major transformational force in my life for three decades now," she said. "The whole purpose of yoga is to know yourself."

Franklin said she follows the ancient Vedic teachings of India. She said there are eight branches of yoga, although many people in the United States practice only one or two branches. She said many people do yoga for its physical benefits.

"Yoga can strengthen and tone muscle, increase flexibility and balance blood pressure through breathing techniques," she said. "Medical science is learning that happiness is good for your immune systems, and some of the postures of yoga can stimulate your endocrine and nervous system in such a way that you can seem much younger than you are."

Franklin said besides lowering stress, yoga has emotional and spiritual benefits.

"The word yoga means connection, or link," she said. "The whole purpose of yoga is complete and total connection to everything. It's a kind of connection to some kind of knowledge outside of our little physical self, like when you have a dream and it comes true the next day."

Franklin said people can achieve that connection through meditation.

"Meditation is part of yoga," she said. "There is a misunderstanding of yoga in this culture, people think it is just twisting and bending. Yoga is the whole ball of wax – the body, mind, emotions and a more spiritual side."

Franklin said yoga involves a belief in something beyond humankind's understanding.

"There must be a sense of faith," she said. "It doesn't have to be in a god with a certain name, or even a god at all. Yoga can be like prayer, but yoga is for everyone. You can do yoga without devoting it to god, you can devote it to another person."

Christina Hauck, associate professor in English, practices Zen Buddhist meditation, separate from yoga. Hauck practices meditation for more than two hours each day at the Tallgrass Zen Center she runs out of her home. She said the purpose of Zen Buddhism is to become enlightened.

"It's like having this beautiful, perfect mirror, and then you start writing telephone numbers on it with lipstick or putting photos on it. Pretty soon the mirror is covered," she said. "Meditation is like discovering what's underneath those layers of photos, papers and lipstick – discovering something that is originally yours. This is what we call waking up, or getting enlightennient."

Hauck said Zen Buddhism doesn't involve prayer through meditation. She said it is commonly mistaken as a religious activity.

Molli Kimple, junior in kinesiology, focuses on her Yoga class Sunday.

"We do 108 prostrations, chanting practice and sitting meditation," she said. "We don't pray in general, but I do know practicing Buddhists who are Jews, Muslims and Catholics."

Scherman said yoga can be spiritual, but it depends on personal preference.

"When you do some poses that are a meditation pose, your body is completely relaxed," she said. "If you chose to make that connection at that time to your god, then that is up to you."

For students like Menke, however, yoga class is just a time for exercise and relaxation.

"I didn't know anything about yoga before I started the class," she said. "It's an incredible experience. You feel great, you can improve your health, and there is not feeling of competition. It's something too good to miss."

21 die in Chicago nightclub stampede of hundreds

By Brandon Loomis
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO – Hundreds of screaming guests rushed the exits of a crowded nightclub Monday after someone used pepper spray or Mace, and at least 21 people were crushed to death or smothered in the panic, officials said.

Firefighters were forced to use sledgehammers and pry bars to open locked or blocked doors that prevented some club-goers from fleeing, Fire Commissioner James Joyce said at a late morning briefing.

"There are people trying to get out that could not get out," Joyce said. "Locked and blocked doors are a contributing factor. We can't explain how management or ownership would allow that."

The locked doors are a fire code violation, Joyce said.

Twenty-one people were confirmed dead in the tragedy at the Epitome Night Club, Chicago Police spokesman Pat Camden said. Hospitals reported treating at least 50 for everything from critical injuries to asthma-like symptoms.

"Everybody smashed; people crying, couldn't breathe," said club-goer Reggie Clark. "Two ladies next to me died. A guy under me passed out."

Some witnesses reported that panic broke out after the guards used pepper spray or Mace to break up a fight, but authorities did not immediately confirm that. Police Commissioner Terry Hillard said investigators are trying to sort out conflicting stories about the source of the spray, and were retrieving a video from inside the club.

"We will get to the bottom of this," Hillard said. "Right now our investigation is at full tilt."

There were more than 1,500 people in the two-story nightclub when the spray was released sometime after 2 a.m., officials initially estimated. They could not immediately say what the legal capacity of the building was.

"It appears a disturbance from within led to a mass chaos where people headed for the door. Most of the fatalities appear to have been crushed or had injuries due to suffocation," police officer Ozzie Rodriguez said.

The club is located in the Near South Side, a commercial district near the McCormick Place convention center.

Cory Thomas, 33, went to the club to pick up two friends. As he waited outside, he saw people inside the club start to back up against the glass front door.

"You could see a mound of people. People were stacking on top of each other, screaming and gagging, I guess from the pepper spray. The door got blocked because there were too many people stacked up against it," he said.

"I saw them taking out a pregnant woman," Thomas said. "She was in bad shape. I saw at least 10 lifeless bodies."

Kristy Mitchell, 22, was one of the people trampled on the stairway.

"People were stomping my legs," she said. "When they pulled me up, I was dizzy and I couldn't breathe."

Amishoov Blackwell, 30, was checking his coat on the second floor when people started rushing past him. The flow of the crowd pushed him back down the stairs and he fell on top of several people, he said. He was trapped on top of the others until firefighters rescued him about 30 minutes later.

"It wasn't nothing but two girls fighting," Blackwell said. "Why'd they have to spray Mace?"

Hours after the disaster, Chiquita Rhodes was still searching for her 19-year-old sister, Charita.

"I've been to every emergency room," Rhodes said. She was told by officials to return to the medical examiner's office around noon, when the bodies would be available for relatives to identify.

She said Charita was holding onto a friend, but they were separated in the crush. A firefighter found Charita's cell phone, she added.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson arrived at the scene early Monday and urged community members to help each other.

"We are asking area ministers to go to hospitals," Jackson said. "My people are overwhelmed with the suddenness of this. At a time like this, you have to lean on your faith."

The president of a Chicago entertainment agency that has booked acts at the club said access to the building was unsafe for large crowds.

"The doorway was obviously inadequate for an emergency," said Ron Onesti of Onesti Entertainment Co. "When the place is filled to capacity, the doorway is very thin."

Photographs on Onesti's Web site depict packed crowds at the nightclub. Onesti maintained that his agency had nothing to do with managing the club and hadn't had any dealings involving it in about a year.

The melee marks one of the nation's deadliest stampedes.

In December 1991, nine young people were crushed to death in a gymnasium stairwell while awaiting a celebrity basketball game in New York.

In December 1979, 11 people were killed in Cincinnati in a crush to get into a concert by The Who.

Ex-military officers file brief supporting affirmative action

Officials, officers announce legal action in court case

By Dee-Ann Durbin
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – Some of the nation's best known retired military officers and former top Pentagon officials will file a Supreme Court brief supporting affirmative action admissions at the University of Michigan.

Former Army undersecretary Joe Reeder, announcing the legal action, said Monday that service academies and ROTC programs need affirmative action to maintain a highly diversified officer corps.

"It is absolutely essential to our fighting force," Reeder said.

"You can't get there yet without taking race into consideration."

More than two dozen officials will support the brief including Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf, the commander in the first Persian Gulf War; Adm. William Crowe, Gen. Hugh Shelton and Gen. John M. Shalikashvili, all former chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; and Gen. Anthony Zinni, former head of the U.S. Central Command.

Also joining the brief, Reeder said, are former Defense Secretaries William Perry and William Cohen.

Tuesday is the deadline for briefs in the Michigan case, which will be argued before the Supreme Court on April 1.

The University of Michigan expects more than 60 briefs will be filed to support its affirmative action admissions policies.

So far, 15 briefs have been filed by opponents of the university's policies, which consider minority status as a factor in deciding which students to pick.

President Bush said on Jan. 15 that he supports diversity in higher education, but that Michigan's program "unfairly rewards or penalizes students based solely on their race."

Applicants for Michigan's undergraduate classes are scored by points, with minorities or some poor applicants receiving a boost of 20 points on a scale of 150. At the law school, admissions officers use a looser formula that tries to ensure each class has a "critical mass" of about 10 percent or 12 percent minority enrollment.

The administration says the point system is skewed toward minorities, noting that a perfect SAT score is worth just 12 points, and an outstanding essay gets three points.

Reeder, an attorney, said, "Nothing that the president has done or said speaks to the cohesiveness of the fighting force. ... It is absolutely critical to have African-American leadership to work with."

Many large companies have also broken with Bush on the affirmative action case, including General Motors Corp., Microsoft, Steelcase, Procter & Gamble, Intel and Banc One. Those companies have filed supporting briefs. More than 100 U.S. House Democrats filed a supporting brief Feb. 13.

Heavy Washington snowstorm causes shutdown of offices, transportation

By Will Lester
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – One of Washington's biggest snowstorms in years finally eased up on the nation's capital Monday, leaving city transportation virtually shut down and city workers facing days of shoveling and plowing to clean snow-clogged streets.

Federal offices were to be closed Tuesday, and District of Columbia Mayor Anthony Williams said that would help the city cope with the snow cleanup.

Williams said there had been so much snow and ice that it could take crews as long as 60 hours to clear some side streets.

"We're going to be working around the clock on it and I'm going to be out there with them," Williams said, referring to city workers.

"They've obviously helped out quite a bit just by staying closed," he said of the federal government.

"We've got over 310 pieces of equipment out there, that makes a difference," Williams said of the ongoing effort to clear the streets.

"The storm is in the last gasps as it heads toward the northeastern United States," meteorologist Andy Woodcock of the National Weather Service in Sterling, Va. said Monday.

The storm left 16.1 inches of snow at Ronald Reagan National Airport as of noon EST Monday, 24.2 inches at Dulles International Airport and 26.6 inches at Baltimore Washington International Airport, forecasters said.

Different areas of the city got more than the 16.1 inches at National Airport, meaning the job of digging out would be even more difficult in some areas.

The city was last hit this hard with a 17-inch snowfall on Jan. 6, 1996.

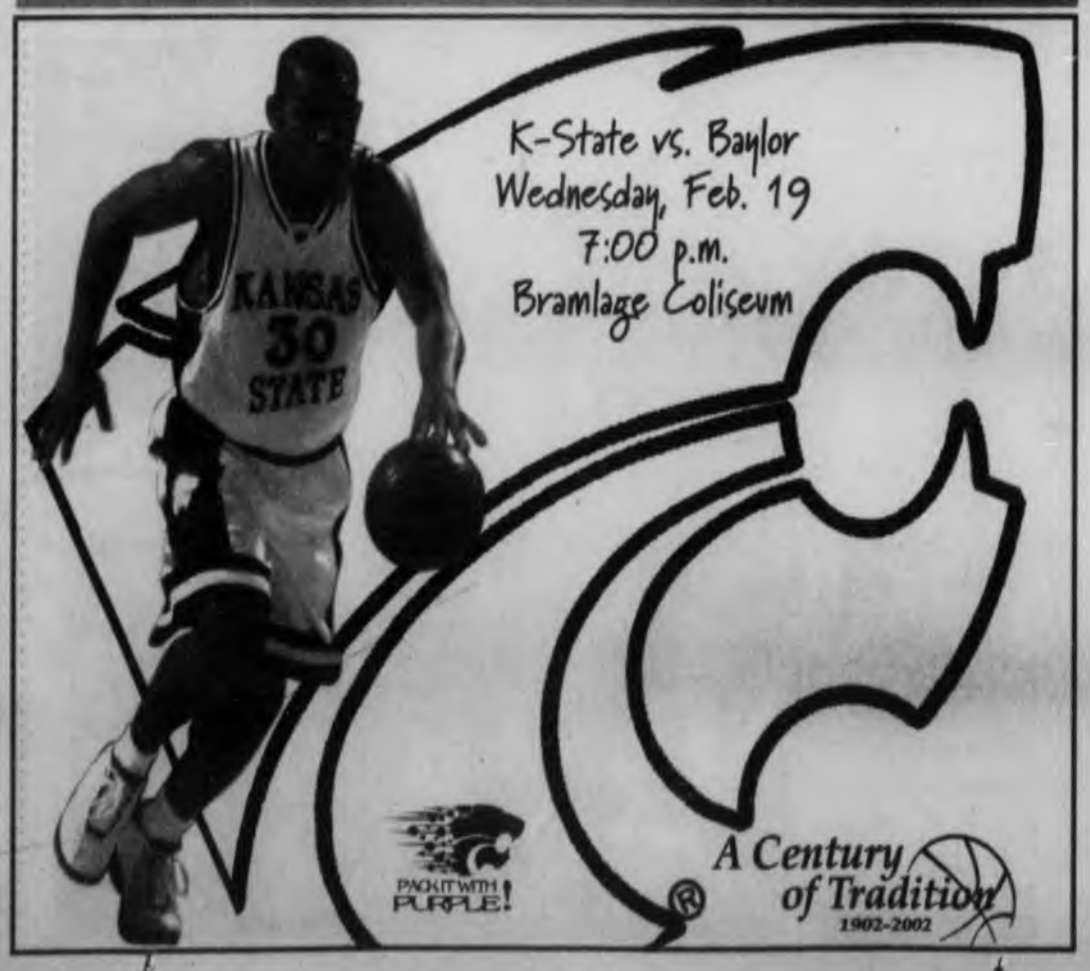
The worst snowfall ever recorded in Washington was the 28 inches that fell Jan. 27-28, 1922 which became known as "the Knickerbocker" storm because the Knickerbocker theater in downtown Washington collapsed during a performance, killing 100 people inside.

One of the mayor's major concerns was what to do with the snow cleared from the streets.

"You can't just dump it in the river. That's an environmental hazard," Williams said. City officials said they were searching for a place to move the snow and leave it.

Ed Tinsley, 22, a senior at the University of Southern California visiting Washington for the weekend, said he would be trapped in the city at least one more day after his flight home was canceled.

"It's beautiful, but honestly it seems like everyone's overreacting," Tinsley said as he wandered the mostly barren downtown streets of the city looking for a place to eat. "It's important for businesses to stay open on a day like this."



The heavy layer of snow closed most of the monuments and museums and the National Zoo.

Major airports in the area were struggling to resume service.

Ronald Reagan National Airport, Dulles International Airport in suburban Chantilly, Va., and Baltimore-Washington International Airport were not open for flights Monday morning, but workers labored to get runways open quickly.

EAGER | Student weapons specialist encourages soldier support

He also thinks part of his duty is to help citizens understand what is going on.

Eager spends the few hours a day that he isn't training watching the news. And he hears both journalists and average citizens talking about the threat of chemical warfare and that the military isn't prepared to handle it.

"As someone who has been exposed to these chemicals, all I can say is that the equipment the military has, works," Eager said.

The most important thing he wants Americans to remember, though, is that soldiers need support – even from those who don't believe in going to war is the solution.

Eager said he believes Americans have the right to protest. In fact, he said, that is one of the many rights that he is defending.

"It is kind of hard to fight a war that so many people are against," he said.

"But that is their right, and this is my job."

And America's job, Eager said, is to support those who are risking their lives to protect their country and the freedoms it allows.

Eager said cards and letters from friends and families help boost morale and make being away from home easier.

"There's nothing easy about preparing to fight a war," Eager said. "It's tough. Every minute of every day is spent thinking about friends and families. I just want to know they are thinking about me, too."

Jamie Alstron, Eager's girlfriend of eight months, said she will be thinking about him and worrying every day.

Even now, she said, she is still shocked that he is really leaving.

"I'm worried. I'm a little scared," Alstron said. "It's really hard to let him leave, but I know he is doing something really good."

year's team that was on the bubble for a regional," he said. "In fact, it was kind of funny. Jack Dahm, their coach, and I were talking, and we're trying to do the same thing – toughen our schedules up a little bit."

K-State will send Jim Ripley and Jonathan Gutierrez to the mound against the Bluejays' top offensive threats.

"We'll see their front-line guys," Clark said. "They're getting ready for the Texas A&M Tournament this weekend, and I'm anxious to see Ripley and Gutierrez throw.

"They've been probably the most consistent pitchers we've had so far in the spring," he said. "It'll be a good battle, and we're going to have to play better than we did today, but it's nice to get the first two games under our belt."

One problem that plagued the Wildcats on Sunday was inconsistent play at shortstop, with Brandon "Boogie" Taylor and Marc Chabot combining for three errors during the doubleheader.

"The only pressure that's really put on us is the pressure we put on ourselves," Taylor said. "Our job is to play whatever position we're at, so any pressure is mostly going to be applied by ourselves.

"The pressure is going to go away the more you play there," he said. "Obviously I'm not a natural shortstop, but the more I get used to playing there, and the more time I get there, it's going to wear off."

Junior Brad Anzman solidified the center field spot on Sunday with a 6-for-10 performance and three RBI. But Anzman said K-State will have to play a far better game defensively to come out on top against the Bluejays.

"They're definitely a team that will probably capitalize on errors," he said. "What we have to do to not have that happen is bear down and play good defense.

"It's up to us. We control the game, not them," Anzman said. "We've got to put the game in our hands, and I'm fully confident we'll start doing that with hard work."

K-State won both games last year between the two teams, 10-9 at home before the Cats later defeated the Bluejays in a lopsided 24-9 game in Omaha, Neb.

"Creighton's a good team," Anzman said. "We've got a strong schedule, obviously, and we're looking forward to playing them.

"We know they're good. They're good every year," he said. "They've got a good program there. We've got a lot of stuff to work on to come out ready to play against Creighton and put up a good game."

ANZMAN | Outfielder expected to be leadoff hitter, center fielder will see quite a bit more playing time than in his first two years at K-State. He is expected to be the Wildcats' leadoff hitter and everyday center fielder in 2003.

Anzman showed he's ready for that role by going 6-for-10, driving in three and scoring two as K-State swept Sunday's doubleheader against Western Illinois.

Wildcat coach Mike Clark said Anzman's performance was nothing new.

"Brad has done that all fall, and he's done it all spring," Clark said. "If he can set the table, good things will happen. It's confidence. He's got a little better idea of his role."

Clark said he understands Anzman's frustration with not playing every day.

"It's just that when we started playing good, he wasn't one of the three outfielders. I know it was frustrating for him at that time, but he kept working on his game. He's a sparkplug, he gets things happening, and he did a nice job today."

Preseason All-America candidate Pat Maloney said Anzman has just been biding his time.

"He's just solid all around," Maloney said. "He's been waiting to do this since he's been here. He's played like this since his freshman year. It's just taken until now before he could finally step in."

Anzman's batting average will likely come down from the lofty .600 where it now rests, and through the course of this long season, Anzman will probably go through his share of the bumps, slumps and bruises that go along with playing college baseball at the Division I level.

However, Anzman said the backup role isn't one he's interested in returning to.

"It's everybody's dream to play when they come here," he said. "And it's a good feeling to be in that situation. The last two years I've wanted to get there, and now I'm just happy that I've been given the opportunity.

"If I can't perform the task, I know somebody else will," he said.

"So I'm just going out there to play the best I can."

FEES | Senate committee discusses SafeRide, Student Publications money

Ron Johnson proposed an increase in $16,000 for fiscal year 2004, $47,000 increase for fiscal year 2005, and a $77,000 increase in operations fees for fiscal year 2006.

For the last three years, Student Publications has experienced a loss in earnings, which Johnson attributes to a slow economy meaning less advertising revenue.

If an increase is not granted, Johnson said there will be serious consequences.

"One of the things we've talked about is per copy cost of the paper," he said. "We would sell the paper each day. We'd have to invest in racks and staff and hit people up on their way to class, probably for more than a dime."

The Collegian would also have to consider cutting its circulation from 12,000 to 10,000, which in turn would warrant a reduction in advertising rates.

The privilege fee committee will meet again at 3 p.m. Sunday in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Panel considers consolidation

School districts might combine

By John Milburn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – Legislators opened a week of debate on school consolidation by taking a new look at findings offered by consultants three years ago, when the issue seemed dead.

The findings of the Denver firm Augenblick and Myers in 2000 were similar to what many legislators now believe – that Kansas would be better off with fewer school districts than the current 303.

The House Education Committee had a briefing on the study, and Chairwoman Kathe Decker, R-Clay Center, said she was not concerned that members of the Senate are reluctant to address consolidation, because the House is moving forward.

"Somebody has to have a sense of urgency to get it going," Decker said.

In interviews Monday, some superintendents said the state's financial problems made consolidation a serious discussion topic.

"It is always contentious, but deserves some consideration and further study," Goddard Superintendent Charlie Edmonds said.

Decker said legislators' goal must be to improve education in areas now served by small school districts.

"If you just look at it from the dollar sense, you don't do justice to the issue," she said.

Decker's committee is scheduled to begin hearings Tuesday on five consolidation bills.

One bill would cut the number of school districts to 105 – or one for each county – on July 1, 2005.

Two of the measures would require all counties with 10,000 or fewer residents to have only a single school district by July 1, 2005, reducing the number to 241.

A fourth measure orders the State Board of Education to examine districts with 400 or fewer students and fewer than 200 square miles in area, with the presumption they'll be dissolved, barring special circumstances.

The fifth measure would require the State Board of Education to study creating 40 regional education districts.

Edmonds said school buildings must close for the state to achieve the savings legislators are seeking.

Mark Tallman, lobbyist for the Kansas Association of School Boards, said many smaller districts want the state to provide greater financial incentives for voluntary consolidation rather than force them to close school buildings and fire teachers and administrators.

BUILDING A SOLDIER

Military standards restrict enlistment

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The few, the proud and those who want to be all they can be don't have an easy road.

Sgt. 1st Class Mike Westphal of the KSU Army ROTC said there are physical and mental standards soldiers must meet before they can join the military. There are hundreds of things that could disqualify one from military service, he said.

"Physically, the greatest disqualifiers prior to enlistment are if they took Ritalin after age 12 or if they have asthma," Westphal said.

Other factors that may prevent enlistment include prior injuries that required screws, pins or plates to repair, and some physical malformations, such as flat feet, Westphal said.

Recruits also are required to pass a full physical examination, according to www.goarmy.com.

During basic training, Westphal said soldiers are required to complete a certain number of push-ups and sit-ups, determined by variables such as age, sex, height and weight.

However, Westphal said, most people don't have trouble with the push-ups and sit-ups.

The running is what prevents the largest number of people from success.

"Once they're in," he said, "the run gives them the most trouble, especially if they haven't run much in the past. A much larger percentage than we'd like fail."

A male college-aged soldier would be required to run two miles in 16 minutes, Westphal said, but the amount of time allowed changes based on age, sex and other characteristics.

Alan Schulenberg, Air Force ROTC cadet, said the field training for ROTC is not as physically demanding as regular basic training, but it requires more leadership and problem-solving skills.

"It had a much different focus," Schulenberg said. "It was physically demanding. We had to do some physical training stuff, but mostly it was about operational information."

Westphal said most soldiers don't need to pass comprehensive mental exams.

The Armed Services Vocational Aptitude Battery is given to recruits to measure knowledge and ability in 10 different areas, according to the U.S. Army's recruitment Web page.

Areas such as science, vocabulary, mathematics, electronics and mechanical comprehension are part of the battery exam.

Westphal said recruits must prove they are emotionally healthy only if they have received prior counseling or therapy.

Usually, he said, it is not an issue, but those who have been through counseling are required prove they are well.

Schulenberg said the real challenge is coping with new experiences.

"Mentally, it's more challenging," he said. "It has a lot more to do with how you deal with stress and changes in environment."

Colleges declared possible 'soft' targets; residents prepare

Code orange may boost local duct-tape sales

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Since the FBI announced colleges and universities could be "soft" targets for terrorist attacks and the raising of the terrorist alert code to orange level, Manhattan business and K-State organizations have experienced different effects.

The terror alert was raised to its second-highest level, orange, but is expected to be lowered soon, according to Associated Press reports.

Scott Cronin, customer service representative for Waters True Value Hardware, said he was nervous when a flood of people came in buying duct tape and plastic sheeting.

"I really didn't know anything about it when people started coming in," he said. "The first day people started coming in, I didn't know if something did happen or was going to happen right away, but now I'm kind of calmed down."

Cronin said the hardware store also had increased sales in gas masks and filters. He said that because the demand occurred late last week, it was right before a shipment, so the hardware store ordered extra duct tape, too.

"If it would've happened earlier last week, we would've sold out."

Cronin said some customers had a sense of humor, saying "My wife made me."

"But on the whole, they seemed pretty serious," he said.

Since the Homeland Security Department suggested people use duct tape and plastic sheeting to seal windows and doors in the event of a bioterrorism attack, hardware stores in Washington, D.C., and New York have sold out of the materials.

The duct tape is supposed to the threat of possible airborne terrorism chemicals entering houses.

While Cronin said True Value's sudden increase in duct-tape sales made him nervous, Karalee Ridder, business manager of Midwest Appliance and ACE Hardware, said her store has had very little increase in duct-tape sales.

"One or two people came in to buy it for other than normal household use, but there has been very little more than normal sales," Ridder said.

While some Manhattan emergency health care providers are receiving the smallpox vaccination, Lafene Health Center workers are not being immunized at this time, said Carol

BANTER AND BELLOW

Bellower interviews potential Banterer as journey continues

Dear Bellower,

I read in the paper that the old Banterer had to quit his job for a while because he was running for vice president of Serbia or something.

Honestly, I can't remember what he was running for because I got so darned excited when I heard you were looking for a temporary Banterer that I almost had an accident in my pants. Ha, ha, ha. No, seriously.

I think I would make an excellent Banterer. I am very intelligent, having graduated at the top of my high school class. I also have a long history of being humorous and opinionated, as I have written a highly acclaimed opinion column for more than two years.

In addition, my communal living situation has given me stellar interpersonal skills, which I could easily use to relate to the readers of "Banter and Bellow."

Lastly, I noticed you are female, and my chances of ever getting a date would skyrocket exponentially if a woman were forced to spend more than 30 seconds in close proximity to me each week.

I would appreciate it if you would get back to me as soon as possible, since I might get snapped up at any moment by the Miami Herald as Dave Barry's replacement, and I would want to give you first snapping dibs.

Irrestrainably yours (unless, of course, you get a restraining order),

Micah P. Hawkinson

Question: Who should the temporary Banterer be?

Banterer Layton Ehmke is on hiatus to pursue political office. You can e-mail Banter and Bellow columnist Dana Strongin, junior in print journalism at banter@spub.ksu.edu.

The Interview: Dana

A girl's gotta move on.

Last week I announced my desire to meet new writing partners while the original Banterer was away.

Soon after that dream was published, I received this letter of inquiry.

Before contacting Mr. Hawkinson, I decided to conduct a background check on him. I found that he was involved in a few shady missing-squirrel incidents, but I still interviewed him.

Here a transcript of our discussion:

Q: Mr. Hawkinson, I see that you graduated at the top of your class. What high school did you go to?

A: Um, I was home-schooled K-12. So I was technically also at the bottom of my class. But I am really smart. See my glasses?

Q: I have read your columns before. In what way are they "highly acclaimed"?

A: On Feb. 4, this dude called the Fourum and said he hated one thing more than me, and that was OU. I think it's safe to assume he's a Sooner fan, and therefore loves me.

Q: You mentioned a communal living situation. Do you live in a scholarship house?

A: You could say that. Actually, it's my parents' house. I've lived there most of my life, and although I have 10 siblings, only eight of us are still at home. Sometimes Dad lets me drive the 15-passenger party wagon.

Q: What are your real chances of getting a date anyway?

A: Realistically, about the same as the chances of the Everlasting Lake of Fire going exothermic, losing its energy source and dropping below 273 degrees Kelvin.

Q: Riiight. Do I really have to sit in close proximity to you? Could we just do this electronically or something?

A: I guess we could. It's just that if I don't spend enough time near real people, I start to hallucinate. Did I mention I used to be a webmaster? Does that impress you? A/S/L? LOL

Q: What would be your mission statement as temp Banterer?

A: To boldly banter where no banterer has bantered before. I am also very romantic and sing beautifully. And I am single.

Thanks for your time. I don't know if I'll be getting back to you.

Karimi, Kyner focus on 4 key issues

Main goals cover SafeRide, book exchange

Ali Karimi

Jared Kyner

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ali Karimi and Jared Kyner are promoting public sensibility and social responsibility as part of their campaign in the upcoming Student Governing Association elections.

Karimi, senior in economics, and Kyner, junior in premedicine and nutrition sciences, are running for student body president and vice president, with a plan titled "The Big Four." Their Big Four include the pair's primary platform issues.

Primary Elections

This is the third in a five-day series profiling, in alphabetical order, the platforms of the candidates running for student body president and vice president.

Primary elections will be Feb. 25 and 26.

"We can help students to succeed to a certain point. Then, they'll have to take it upon themselves and utilize the programs offered," Kyner said.

The Big Four issues include extending the university's deadline for dropping a class, organizing more book exchange options, getting SafeRide running and getting rid of mandatory 7:30 a.m. finals and lectures.

Karimi's model for extending the drop deadline is Stanford University, where students can drop classes until finals week.

Kyner said the Stanford procedure would give students a better idea of whether they can pass or pull up their grade.

"K-State would still be getting full tuition costs, so money isn't an issue," Kyner said. "I don't know why they force you to make that decision so early in the semester."

As far as expanding book exchange options, Karimi and Kyner would like to implement an online version of the student exchange board and form a book fair at the beginning and end of each semester.

"I'd like to link the career fair and the book fair," Karimi said. "Somebody would be working the booth for each college."

He said there would be a tablet where students in the college would write each book they wanted to sell and their minimum bid offer.

Karimi said the online book exchange option would be modeled from Fort Hays State University's Web site.

It's necessary to implement more book exchanging options because the current option costs too much for the students, Kyner said.

The candidate's next plank addresses 7:30 a.m. class lectures and finals.

"We're not for cutting out all 7:30 a.m. classes," Kyner said. "If it's a lab or recitation, then that's the student's choice. If a student likes to get up early in the morning, they should be able to have that time slot available."

Kyner said they don't like the mandatory finals and lectures which give students no choice because it's hard to go to bed early when attending college.

Karimi said classes and finals such as public speaking are scheduled at 7:30 a.m. despite what the instructor would prefer.

"We just want to give the teacher more power in the scheduling," he said.

The last issue in The Big Four is to get the SafeRide program running.

"As with anything new, there's bound to be some bumps in the road," Karimi said. "We just want to be the guys to smooth them out."

In addition, Kyner said they would like to rename the SafeRide program to Woozy Wildcat Ride.

Because Karimi has been a senator before, he said he knows the procedure that would need to take place in order to accomplish their goals.

He said that within the year, the Big Four can be accomplished.

Karimi said that while there are a number of other issues the pair is interested in, they don't want to overload anybody. As a result, he said, there has to be student input on everything going on with the university.

"There are a lot of students who have good ideas but don't have the initiative to go through with it," Karimi said.

Karimi said he and Kyner want to be the voice of the students.

"No students, no university. Period," he said.

RCPD adjusts budget to benefit city, county

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department is dipping into its excess funds from 2001 and 2002 to help the city and county deal with the loss of the state's demand transfers.

Carry-over funds from years past will allow the police department to reduce aid received from the county and city by nearly $500,000 during the next two years without adversely affecting the police department's operations, Mike Watson, RCPD finance director, said.

However, Watson said there will be no cuts for 2003.

The Riley County Clerk's office requested that the RCPD try to find ways to reduce the amount of aid needed from the county.

The Law Board, which makes decisions concerning the police department's allocation of funds, decided to grant cuts of $49,300 to the county for this year, said Johnette Mueller, Riley County budget and finance operator.

The city and county were refused demand transfers from the state, which essentially are general-use funds for the local governments. Without this expected income, the city and county will be forced to make cuts.

Mueller said the police department's cuts were not as large as the county had requested, and said she thinks the county is in a much more dire need of funds than the city is.

"We're kind of caught between a rock and a hard place," Mueller said. "From what I understand, the city doesn't need the money as much as we do."

The city of Manhattan benefits the most from the Law Board's decision, despite the fact the county is the one that requested the cuts, said Bernie Hayen, director of finance for the city of Manhattan.

"I think the county is probably stampeding to make budget cuts before it's really necessary," Hayen said.

The city will take a more detailed look at the budget picture in April and May, when the amount of revenue from sales taxes is more predictable, he said.

The city will save about $200,000 next year because of the Law Board's decision, but Hayen said he isn't sure whether this money is a necessity.

"Right now we're just looking at this as another source of revenue," he said. "We won't be doing much until May, except monitoring where we're at."

The Law Board has legal authority over the RCPD's funds, while the city and county do not. The city contributes about 80 percent of the police department's funds, with the county contributing the other 20 percent.

RCPD's cuts were returned to the respective governments in these same proportions, Watson said.

Funds of about $393,000 were taken from carry-over funds from 2001 and 2002, Watson said, with another $100,000 from the emergency reserve fund. These monies were pooled together and will be split between the 2003 and 2004 budgets, to be allotted to the city and county based on the percentage of funding provided by each government.

Watson said the police department's emergency reserve fund retained about $437,000.

The county would be able to distribute the money from the RCPD's cuts at its discretion, but Mueller said she was unsure how the money would be divided.

No matter how the city and county decide to distribute the funds from the cuts, Mark Taussig, city commissioner and Law Board member, said the cuts were a compromise situation, and the most important aspect was that the RCPD not lose its ability to serve the community.

"It's not going to hamstring our law enforcement," Taussig said.

Bush: American security won't be influenced by protestors

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

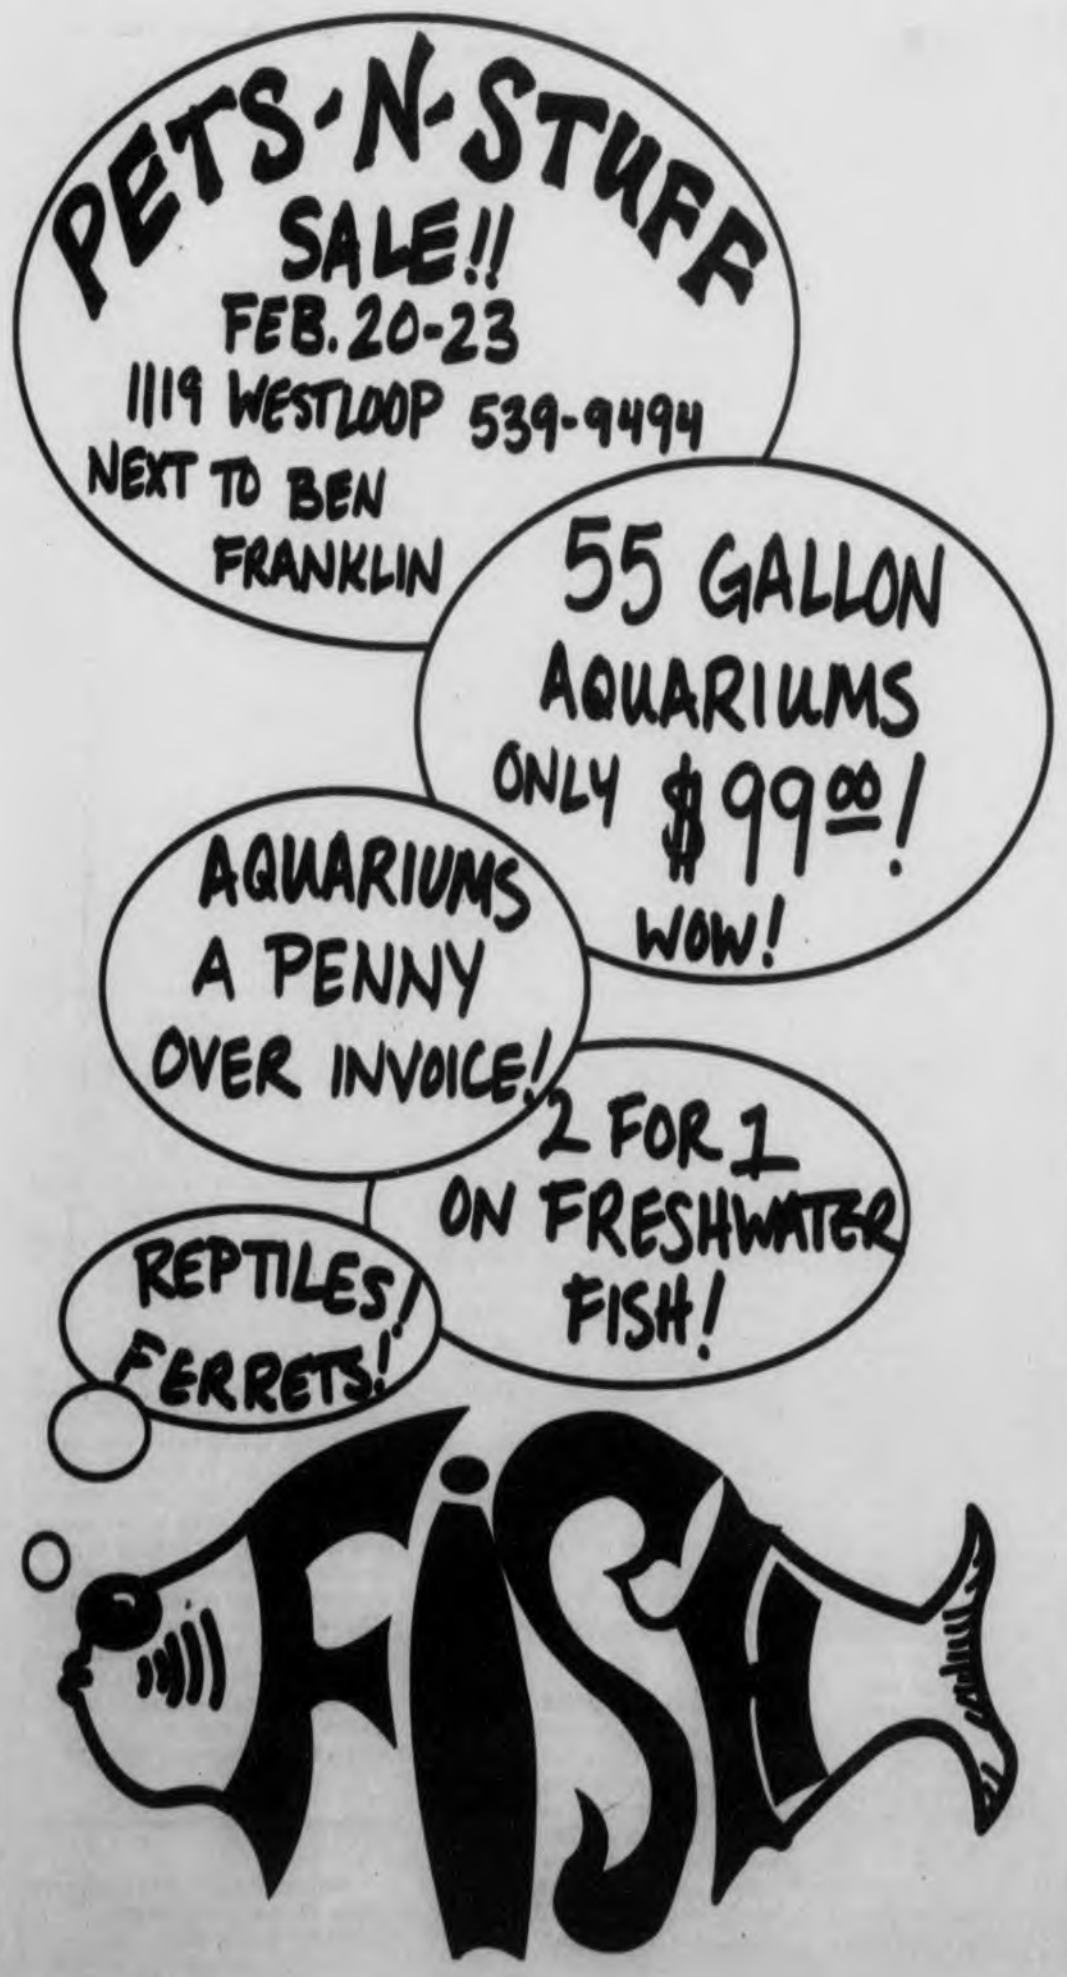
WASHINGTON – Declaring that America's security should not be dictated by protesters, President Bush said Tuesday he would not be swayed from compelling Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to disarm.

"We will deal with him," Bush said as U.S. and British diplomats weighed another bid for United Nations backing.

"War is my last choice," Bush said at the White House as echoes of anti-war protests circled the globe.

Standing firmly against skeptical allies as well as the demonstrators, Bush said: I owe it to the American people to secure this country. I will do so."

Administration officials in Washington and at the U.N. in New York were discussing the possible gains as well as the risk of a diplomatic defeat if the United States proposed a new resolution to the Security Council to endorse force as an option to disarm Iraq.



One U.S. official said Tuesday there was no decision on a text or even on whether to go ahead, though White House spokesman, Ari Fleischer said, Bush said a second resolution "would be useful," although "we don't need a second resolution. It's clear this guy could even care less about the first resolution. He's in total defiance."

In Rome, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said Iraq had to "move very fast" to heed the call of the international community and cooperate with U.N. inspectors or face possible war.

But he said it was up to the Security Council to decide if the inspections had gone on long enough.

France, with support from Russia and China, does not accept the U.S. view that the Security Council effectively endorsed force as an option to disarm Iraq in an earlier resolution that warned of "serious consequences" if Saddam persisted in defying United Nations demands.

With some 50 countries lined up to speak to the council in a session that could go over until Wednesday, early action by the United States and its close ally, Britain, was not expected.

TO THE POINT

Consolidation will ultimately benefit schools

Kansas legislators will increase the integrity and fiscal stability of school districts in the state if they choose to consolidate districts.

Consolidation – the closing of schools and the transfer of students to other schools – could save the state an estimated $480 million.

Operating costs would be cut in parts of the state. Consolidation will also ensure an equal educational opportunity. School populations will be more evenly distributed, helping ease transitions into higher education.

Personnel also will come under the knife, but this allows school districts to retain the best teachers.

With consolidation comes the need for increased transportation. Though this may be an added cost to the state, it will be little compared to the deficit the state now incurs.

Consolidation is the best option for students in Kansas. With this approach, the quality of education will flourish.

TEXTBOOK TURMOIL

Campus-wide exchange system bad idea for students

MICAH HAWKINSON

Textbook prices are important to students.

That's the message I get, anyway, after looking at this year's batch of Student Governing Association election rhetoric.

No less than three of the pairs running for SGA president and vice president have textbook-exchange planks in their campaign platforms.

These exchanges appeal to common sense. After all, why pay $90 for a new textbook when somebody else will give you the same book in return for one you aren't using anymore?

Unfortunately, implementing a campus-wide exchange system wouldn't be as simple as trading books with a buddy.

As someone who has worked a tiny bit in the textbook business, I can tell you that very little about the industry is simple.

Publishers constantly release new editions of books. Instructors want the most accurate textbooks for their classes, but many times they can't agree which books are the best to use. As a result, books can change as often as – if not more often than – teachers do.

The result is a mixed jumble of authors, titles, and a whole wad of uncertainty about how valuable any given book actually is. And semester grades can hinge on whether students have the proper books for their courses.

For the sake of argument, let's suppose you spend about $400 on books each semester. We'll also assume you went to the store late, so you can only get about two-thirds of your books used.

If that were the case, your books would have cost about $500 new, so you've already sort of saved $100 by getting them from the bookstore instead of ordering from the publisher.

Suppose you use the books all semester and glean the precious, precious knowledge from them until there is nothing you don't know.

After studying for finals, you bring the books in to sell back during Dead Week.

We'll assume you can only sell two-thirds of your books for the retail buyback price. That gives you about $167.

We'll further assume that you can sell back half of the remaining books at the national wholesale value, which gives you about $50 more, for a grand total of $217.

That means books cost you a net total of $183, which is about $3.03 more than the first three seasons of "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" on DVD. That doesn't count the money you saved by getting them used instead of new.

In return for that chunk of dinero, you get the assurance that your books will be the correct editions or you get your money back.

Compare that to the problems of textbook-exchange programs.

When you trade around with other students, it's difficult to know if the books are really going to be used for the same courses in the following semester. The only way to know for sure if you have the right book is to compare the International Standard Book Number on the book with what the teacher says he or she is using.

Or the book you get from someone else could be damaged or missing pages.

If you confront the other person about it, who's to say he or she won't accuse you of damaging it yourself?

Or there might be no one who has the book you need, in which case you might have to order it and get by without a textbook until you can get one delivered. This could be a real problem if you have assignments due.

During this election, you'll have to choose whether the potential benefits of exchange programs would outweigh the disadvantages.

For my money, it's good, old-fashioned bookstores. The textbooks there might cost a bit more, but at least they're guaranteed to be the right ones.

Month between Valentine's Day, spring break can take its toll on students

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

The wind shrieks in a cold fury as you huddle under your blanket. You have been locked in your room for hours studying until your eyes droop from exhaustion.

Projects and tests are overwhelming, and the cold your roommate passed on has left you weak and dizzy.

Feb. 19 to March 17 is a tedious, desolate month.

At the end of January, the routine of school was steeped in familiarity.

The balance of school, work and fun was set at an agreeable, energetic pace.

The beginning of February was marked by an anticipation for Valentine's Day.

The air was festive, and the stores were alive with color. Dates and parties were in abundance. The crisp February air was refreshing and pleasant.

Now there is nothing but the daunting task of facing a month filled with obstacles and annoyances.

The weather

Kansas students are troopers. When we roll out of bed in the morning, there is more to battle than morning tiredness. Donning coats, hats and gloves, students trudge to their cars. Even your engine whines about the cold as it sluggishly sputters to a start. The next 10 minutes are spent scraping inches of ice off your car as your body goes numb. When the blood in your hands and feet begin to circulate again, you drive to class. You consider yourself lucky to have found a parking space within a mile of campus, but the freezing process persists as you walk to class. This routine will make a student seriously consider transferring to the University of Texas just to stay warm. OK, we will never be that desperate, but the cold can make one grumpy.

Cold/flu season

When the welcome mat is rolled out for February, the cold and flu season descends upon us like a devious lion crouched and waiting for his prey. A slight cough plagues you, but it is easy to brush off as nothing while you fearlessly overload yourself with work and school. Then the fever, body aches and racking cough consume you. Still in denial, you push through the month of February unyieldingly.

Then, one fateful morning, your body refuses to get out bed. The sickness can no longer be ignored. Now, since you have assiduously pushed yourself to the limit, you are undeniably sick. Missing classes and work throws you farther behind than you could have imagined.

First tests and projects

Still weak from battling your illness and not completely healed, students staunchly prepare for first tests and projects. It seems as if every class has deadlines the same week. Running on four hours of sleep a night, caffeine and sheer terror, students tackle the insurmountable tasks ahead. Spring break is like a distant lifeline beyond the reach of your cold, tired, feeble fingers. The warmth and happiness of spring break is too far beyond the stretch of imagination. February has left you bitter and lethargic.

Take heart

I hate February and the beginning of March. However, I know that when spring break descends upon us, it will be met with an elated relief. Life is much sweeter when we are forced to overcome strife. Battling the cold gives us a greater appreciation for the beauty and warmth of spring. Combating illness gives us a deeper gratitude for the good health we often take for granted. And laboring away on our schoolwork will be all worth it as the final stretch of school appears on the horizon.

Age inspires wishes

Growing older evokes sports recollections

SEAN PURCELL

Twenty-two.

It's a weird age to be.

It's a weird time in your life.

You're old enough to drink, but for me, drinking became less cool a long time ago.

The adventure of it is gone. It's more a means to relax than a means to have fun.

That's how many I am today – 22.

Being 22 years old reminds me of sports. If you know me, you know everything reminds me of sports. I find a way to bridge the gap, however unstable that bridge may be.

But this time, I think I've got it.

On Feb. 19 2002, it was like winning the World Series for the first time.

I was the Anaheim Angels.

Turning 21, you think your life is at a pinnacle. You're legal. You have a reason to have fun. There's nothing holding you back.

I was Troy Glaus. I was on top of the world.

But one year later, I feel like the Angels probably will at the end of the 2003 season, wondering how so much could have changed in one year.

See, compared to being 21, the idea of being 22 isn't as flashy.

You aren't winning the pennant. You aren't even making the playoffs.

It would be like if the Lakers didn't win the NBA title. How would they feel? Would they feel like they accomplished anything, or would it just be a big disappointment?

But turning 22 could also mean the decision to make this year the best yet. Leaving 21 could be the end of those "crazy times" and the beginning of really making something of myself.

It could be like K-State football. This year seemed like a disappointment to some, but that just means the team can strive to make next year even better. Maybe even a national championship.

The last few months of being 21, though, have let me know that 22 has the chance of being brighter.

Like spring training for baseball fans, there's an extra bounce in your step.

You feel like you can accomplish anything. For the teams that didn't amount to much the year before, it's the chance to make the new season different. For the teams that did accomplish something, it's the chance to continue the success.

But more than anything, the start of another trip around the sun means another year of not knowing what could come your way. That's why life – and sports – is so great.

I bet that after the K-State women's basketball team celebrated its 32nd year in 2000-01, a season in which they went 12-16, its players never thought that a year later they would be on top of the college lady-hoops world and roll to a Sweet 16 appearance.

It's the thought, and idea, that something good will come out of the next year that keeps you going.

So 22 won't be so bad.

What do I wish?

A K-State win tonight against Baylor would be nice. But more than that, I wish sports sagas would unfold just like they did when I was 21 – unpredictable and unforgettable.

Working To Improve

Cats set goals for success

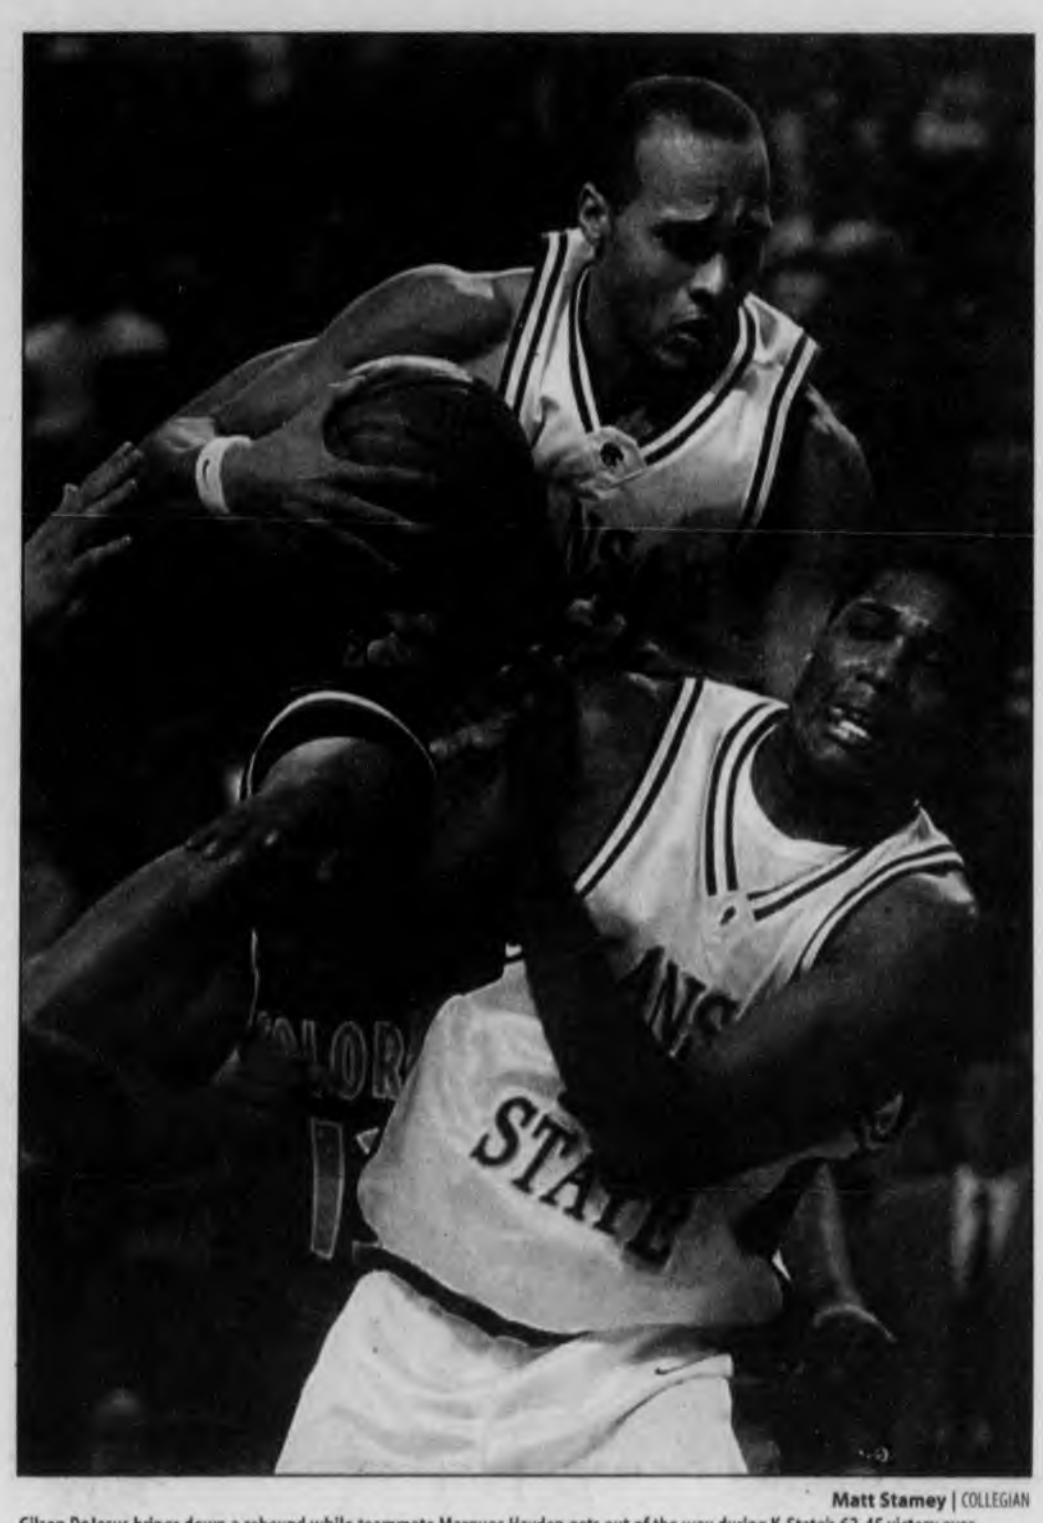
By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The men's basketball team has goals of improvement.

In each of Coach Jim Wooldridge's two years, the team has done just that – 11 wins in 2000-01 and 13 in 2001-02. But with six games remaining on the 2002-03 schedule, time is running out for the Cats (12-11, 3-7) to improve on last year's performance.

That hasn't kept Wooldridge and his players from dreaming higher than 14 wins, though.

This year's team wants to play in the postseason.



With only two of the Cats' six games against upper-tier conference opponents, remaining Wooldridge said he sees a chance for his players and the program.

"We talked to our team about improving and giving ourselves opportunities through that to play in the postseason," Wooldridge said. "It's a goal that all these kids have, yet we know that we can't accomplish that unless we take care of the everyday details of improvement."

The "everyday details" start with tonight's game against Baylor (11-10, 2-8). Wooldridge said the Cats' next step toward a merry March is a win over the Bears.

Even though Baylor has struggled on the road, battling the Bears will prove to be

Defense, competitiveness have Cats confident

No. 5 K-State (23-2, 10-1) at Missouri (13-9, 7-4)
When: 7 tonight
Where: Hearnes Center (13,545) — Columbia, Missouri
Key stat: K-State ranks first in the Big 12 in field-goal percentage (.337) and scoring (53.2 ppg) defense.

When explaining how No. 5 K-State has managed to race to its best record through 25 games in program history, Coach Deb Patterson points to two elements.

"First and foremost, we've been bringing a high-caliber defensive effort to the floor," Patterson said during Tuesday's Big 12 coaches' conference call. "Secondly, our team has just brought a good level of competitive composure to the floor over the course of 40 minutes.

"It's those two things that have kept us competitive throughout games."

The Cats' 76 points per game haven't hurt matters either, but K-State's defensive presence is what has garnered the most attention during the team's five-game winning streak.

Patterson's club ranks tops in the Big 12 in scoring defense (53.2 ppg) and field-goal percentage defense (.337).

But as good as K-State (23-2, 10-1) has been on defense, Missouri (13-9, 7-4) coach Cindy Stein is more worried about the Cats' third-rated scoring offense.

Zone defenses have worked against K-State recently, but Stein said the Tigers won't stick to any certain approach tonight when Missouri welcomes the Cats to Columbia for a 7 p.m. tip.

"Even with people playing a zone, they've still won the game," Stein said. "We're going to stick to whatever we do well, and if we're playing the zone well, we may do that."

Stein's reasoning lies in statistics.

Despite Laurie Koehn's absence, the Cats still rank fifth in the league from 3-point range at 34 percent and second in overall shooting at 47 percent.

"Kansas State is just such a great shooting team that I'm not sure that you want to give them very many open looks for very long," Stein said. "They're smart enough that they're going to figure it out."

In the teams' first meeting – a 68-52 K-State win in Manhattan on Feb. 5 – the Wildcats struggled to figure it

One statistic got under Coach Mike Clark's skin following Sunday's doubleheader sweep of Western Illinois.

Clark's Wildcats committed five errors against the Leathernecks, including four in the middle infield.

In Tuesday's 15-2 win against Creighton (0-2) at Tointon Family Stadium, K-State managed to do a little better.

The Cats committed no errors and continued the team's hot hitting with 16 hits to cruise past the Bluejays in the club's final tuneup before this weekend's Service Academy Classic in Millington, Tenn.

"I like what I see," Clark said. "We made some nice plays in the outfield, and infield-wise, we did a good job. On the offensive side, we're swinging the bats really good."

Junior college transfer Jim Ripley (1-0) booked five innings of solid work from the mound, and six Wildcats turned in multi-hit performances from the plate, as the Cats moved to 3-0 on the season for the third time in as many years.

MLB | Ephedrine blamed in pitcher's death

A weight-loss drug containing a stimulant probably contributed to the heatstroke death of Baltimore Orioles pitching prospect Steve Bechler, a coroner said Tuesday.

Bechler had been taking an over-the-counter supplement that contained ephedrine, which has been linked to heatstroke and heart trouble, Broward County medical examiner Dr. Joshua Perper said.

Ephedrine has been banned by the NCAA, the NFL and the International Olympic Committee, but not by major league baseball.

Tyson boarded a chartered jet Tuesday to Memphis, Tenn., according to promoter Gary Shaw, and is ready to face whoever is in the ring against him Saturday.

Redshirt freshman Coby Cost was named the Big 12 Indoor Field Male Athlete of the Week, the conference announced Monday.

Cost won the weight throw competition for the sixth-straight meet with a school-record toss of 68 feet, 5 3/4 inches.

Since the season began, Cost has broken the school record five times and has added four feet to the previous record holder's mark.

Cost is the third Wildcat to earn weekly honors after Jared MacLeod and Rebekah Green took the male and female awards on Jan. 13.

Interior architecture, design programs 2 of best

National survey awards K-State 3rd place in nation

By Kelli Pitman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The interior design and interior architecture programs at K-State are among the best in the country.

The programs, combined in a national survey, were recently ranked third in the nation for interior design/interior architecture programs by the Design Intelligence and the Design Futures Council.

This is the third consecutive year that the programs have been ranked in the top three. No other Big 12 school is rated in the survey's top 15 programs.

Gwendolyn O'Neal, apparel textiles and interior design professor, said 300 of the top interior design and architecture firms from across the country are surveyed about which universities have produced the most successful graduates based on an evaluation of their employees.

"The firms look at which employees are best and the university they graduated from, and in this case, K-State was named the third most amount," O'Neal said.

The Almanac of Architecture and Design publishes the findings from many surveys similar to this one, ranking the top 15 architecture programs as well as the top 15 interior design programs.

"This is a very long and credible publication. It is great to have a published ranking in such a highly credible publication," O'Neal said.

Judy Roland, interior architecture academic adviser, said much of K-State's success is attributed to its five-year program, as opposed to the four-year programs that many other universities offer. The program's extended curriculum gives students hands-on experience such as the use of computer-aided design programs and structural reality programs.

Additionally, the students participate in historical preservation of sites in downtown Kansas City, Topeka and other communities.

"Students use their skills to help revitalize the community while getting real hands-on experience," Roland said.

Students also have opportunities to interact with clients and do specific projects for clients, which makes them more prepared when they begin looking for a job, she said.

"Our interior architecture students are a small minority in the job market, and that helps us get more of our graduates out and our name more well-known," Roland said. "Upon graduation, students have a lot of skills to sell – not just one – and that makes them very successful."

Andrea Kubiak, second-year interior architecture student, said the main reason students choose K-State's program is because of its success and high rank.

It really shows the ability of the teachers and reflects the close and friendly relationships between teachers and the students, Kubiak said. The professors are always pushing students to improve their work and to have confidence in their own designs, she said.

K-State has consistently been ranked in the top three but wants to better that ranking and be No. 1 in the near future, Kubiak said.

"They want to make the program better and better each year, and to do that they are raising the bar with each class that comes to K-State," she said. "The program is becoming more and more selective."

City Commission passes all items on agenda; discusses Auth-Florence, zoning regulations

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At the City Commission meeting Tuesday night, all three items on the general agenda were passed.

The first item on the general agenda was the approval of the economic development assistance incentive package for the Auth-Florence Manufacturing Company.

The package includes the price of the land sale, a forgivable land payment, a payment of special assessments, industrial revenue bonds, a tax abatement agreement, a forgivable loan and performance provisions.

The mailbox manufacturing company said it desires occupancy in August, and production will begin in October.

Bill Thompson, business recruiter for Kansas State of Commerce, said Manhattan's incentive proposal was not the company's best offer. However, Auth-Florence chose Manhattan for the work force and the people.

Mayor Ed Klimek said he felt it was important that Manhattan's package was not extravagant and that it was good for all involved.

"The risk of not doing this is far greater," Bruce Snead, city commissioner, said. "The agreement as proposed will allow us to provide quality jobs."

Auth-Florence proposed to bring 100 to 250 jobs to the Manhattan area.

The second item on the general agenda – approving the first reading of an ordinance amending the Manhattan zoning regulations to add health and fitness clubs as conditional use in the Industrial Park District – was unanimously passed.

The third item – approving the first reading of an ordinance amending the final development of the Hill Office Planned Unit Development proposal with five conditions – was passed 3-2.

Kansas State University Federal Credit Union proposed an amendment to add banks and financial institutions with a drive-in service as a permitted use to a building.

Neighbors addressed the commission with complaints of possible lighting and traffic problems, as well as depreciation of property value.

"These are the ones we hate," Rich Seidler, city commissioner, said.

He said the architects are willing to work with the residents within reason and hoped they would continue.

Klimek and Mark Taussig, city commissioner, both sided with the neighbors.

Klimek felt reducing lighting around the ATMs for the neighbors' sake would decrease safety for the users.

Taussig said he'd rather see something besides a vacant building on the corner, but decided not to approve the proposal.

"It would be disheartening for me if my property was adjacent to a banking facility because of light sensitivity, but I hope they will be as receptive and sensitive to the neighbors as they can," Brad Everett, city commissioner, said.

City Commission agenda

The following were discussed at the Manhattan City Commission meeting Tuesday night:

- Commission approved the incentive package for the Auth-Florence Manufacturing Company unanimously.
- Commission approved the first reading of an ordinance amending the Manhattan Zoning Regulations to add health and fitness clubs as a conditional use, 5-0.
- Commission passed the first reading of an ordinance amending the final development plan of the Hill Office Planned Unit Development with five conditions, 3-2.

European Union nations agree on declaration warning Iraqi officials to immediately disarm

By Robert Wielaard
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BRUSSELS, Belgium – "Old" and "new" Europe united Tuesday behind a declaration warning Iraq it has one last chance to disarm, papering over an acrimonious dispute that has set back the continent's push for a single voice in world affairs.

Far from the thunderous unity they sought, Europe's quest for a common foreign policy was undermined by France's stinging reproach of eastern European nations that earlier backed Washington's threat of military action against Iraq.

The joint declaration agreed upon by the 15 European Union members Monday night and endorsed Tuesday by 13 future EU members warns Iraq it must disarm "fully and completely."

They agreed to give U.N. weapons inspectors more time, but set no deadlines and asserted "war is not inevitable," a concession to France and Germany, which have sought a resolution to the crisis.

"We had extensive, very effective and constructive consultations and we have reached an agreement" on the EU summit declaration, said Greek Prime Minister Costas Simitis, whose country holds the rotating EU presidency.

But a tirade by French President Jacques Chirac against future EU members demonstrated the limits of the declaration in achieving a united front.

Chirac was angered that some of the new members had backed Washington's pro-war language on Iraq in two recent letters written without full EU consultation. The texts revealed a divide within Europe between the Franco-German camp, which favors a peaceful resolution, and those backing the U.S. threat of force – prompting Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to famously dub France and Germany, "Old Europe."

"It is not really responsible behavior," Chirac told reporters Monday just after the EU issued its declaration on Iraq. "It is not well brought-up behavior. They missed a good opportunity to keep quiet."

He warned the candidates their position could be "dangerous" because the parliaments of the 15 EU nations still have to ratify last December's decision for 10 new members to join the bloc on May 1, 2004. He singled out Romania and Bulgaria, which are still negotiating to enter the bloc in 2007.

Britain and Germany defended the future members' right to express their own opinions – a blow to French aspirations to be one of the primary architects of European foreign policy.

"They have as much right to speak up as Great Britain or France or any other member of the European Union today," British Prime Minister Tony Blair told reporters in London.

In an unusual move, Blair also sent a letter to the candidate countries reporting his views on the summit declaration – a role usually reserved for the EU presidency.

He also made clear his disagreement with the Greek presidency's decision excluding the new members from the emergency summit on Monday when leaders debated a common approach.

While eastern European leaders welcomed the chance to join Europe in the declaration, they reacted defiantly to Chirac's outburst, reminiscent to some of the former Soviet Union's overbearing manner toward its satellites.

Saudi Arabia to try 90 Saudis with alleged al-Qaeda links

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia – Saudi Arabia, facing U.S. criticism for laxness on fighting terrorism, said Tuesday it has referred 90 Saudis to trial for alleged al-Qaeda links and that 250 Saudi suspects were under investigation.

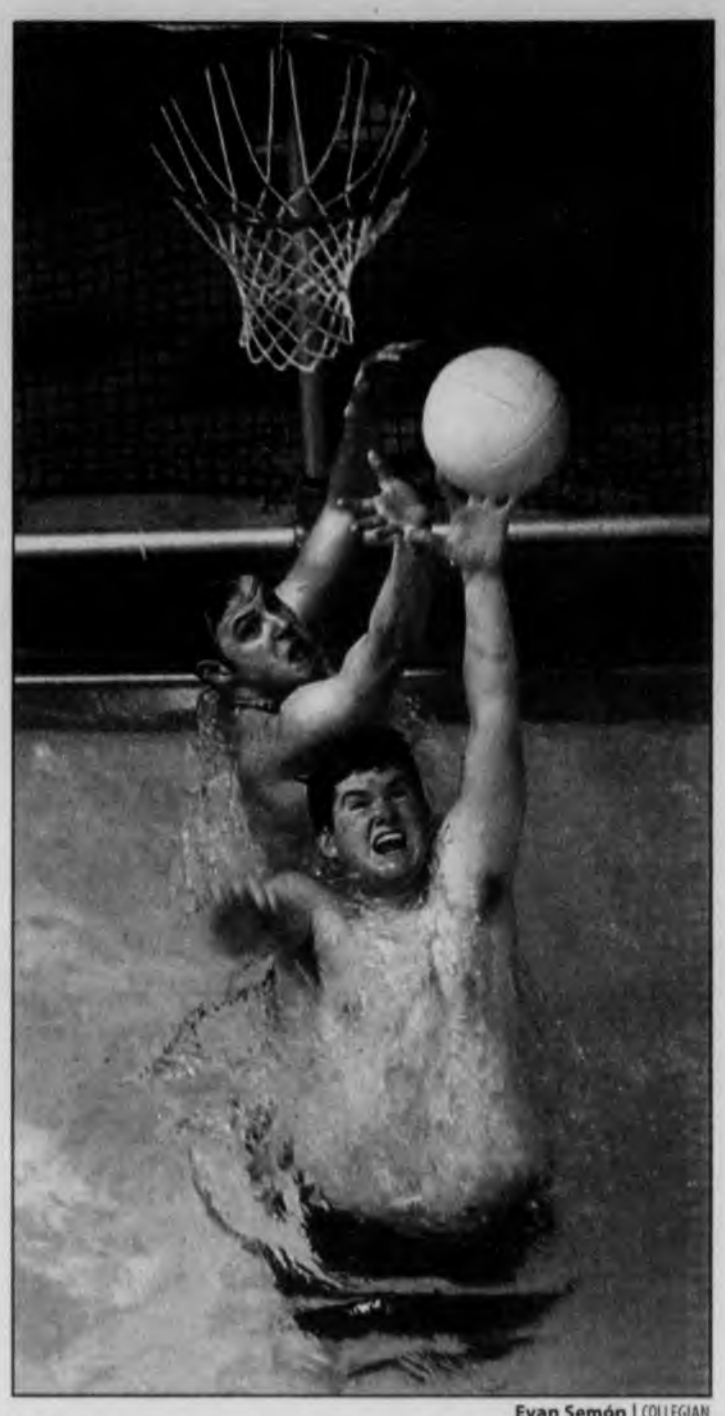
The announcement from Interior Minister Prince Nayef, reported in the kingdom's Arabic-language newspaper Okaz, was the first word of Saudi court proceedings connected to post-Sept. 11 terror crackdowns.

Of the suspects being questioned, the prince said "investigations proved they have links with al-Qaeda and other similar networks, but we still need to determine the level of involvement for each one of them," according to the paper.

Prince Nayef also said more than 150 Saudi suspects had been released after being cleared of terror connections – reportedly including a suspect wanted by the United States.

Saud Abdulaziz Saud al-Rasheed, 21, became a suspect after his photograph was found in material overseas with pictures of some of the Sept. 11 hijackers.

The FBI issued a bulletin for his arrest in August, nearly a year after the attacks. Al-Rasheed turned himself in to Saudi authorities days after learning of the bulletin.



His father, Abdulaziz al-Rasheed, told The Associated Press his son was freed Tuesday "after authorities found that charges leveled against him by the Americans were baseless."

In Washington, the FBI declined to comment on his reported release.

The father, who works for the Saudi Red Crescent in the capital Riyadh, said he intends to sue U.S. authorities.

The father said his son, who runs a sweet shop in Riyadh, traveled to Afghanistan to do humanitarian work and returned to Saudi Arabia several months before Sept. 11.

Birth order can influence children's personalities

By Katie Lane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Responsible. Neglected. Self-centered.

Where children are in the birth order can affect their personalities and how their parents treat them, but that doesn't hold true in all cases, said Kim Moir, clinical social worker at Cornerstone Family Counseling Center.

"Certainly there's tendencies for the oldest to be more of a leader in the family and to take responsibility earlier," Moir said. "The baby tends to be babied a little bit more and given more privileges because the parents have relaxed. There's a stereotype of middle children being ignored."

The oldest child

Jamie (Burrell) Henningson is the oldest of four children. She said she enjoyed being the eldest because she got to do everything first.

"I got to pick the car we all had through high school. It was a 1975 Plymouth Duster," Henningson, a third-year student in veterinary medicine, said. "You get away with more stuff."

She lives with her younger sister, Shauna, and her younger brother, Tim, who also attend K-State. Their youngest brother, Stefan, is a high school senior in Topeka.

The first-born can cause parents turmoil because usually parents aren't sure what to do, Moir said.

"Most parents have a lot more anxiety with the first child. They are practicing new skills. I think generally, the value system remains the same across birth order unless there's been a dramatic event to alter that value system."

The middle child

Shauna Burrell, junior in kinesiology, said middle children can be ignored. She said she wasn't allowed to drive before taking driver's education, but her younger brother was given that opportunity.

"I was the dumb one in driver's ed because the other kids knew what they were doing," she said.

The middle child can feel out of place in the family, Jurich said.

"They are the most often likely to get lost," he said. "They had the youngest stage for a while, but they got that taken away from them. Middle children very often are very good at jobs that don't require a lot of vision, but a lot of hard work."

The youngest child

Tim Burrell, freshman in engineering, said he didn't think he or his siblings were spoiled, but he felt the need to achieve as much as his sisters did.

"They accomplished so much, I felt like I had to be good at stuff," he said.

The youngest child in the family is often indulged more than the other children, Jurich said.

"The baby of the family can be protected," Jurich said. "Youngest children feel they don't have to do something to garner praise – they just have to be, which can make younger children more self-centered. Youngest children, very often, don't know how to do responsibility type things."

The only child

Only children often see their parents more and receive more attention, but there are disadvantages to not having siblings, Moir said.

"Usually there's more financial resources, because they only have one child," she said. "Because there's more time, parents are able to attend all the events. In a way, they are at a disadvantage because an only child misses out on the benefits of learning to share and having to divide their time between their parents. It's a great value to learn how to not be the center of attention."

Above: "Willie was my first de-claw patient," said Jamie Burrell, junior in veterinary medicine, as Tim, Jamie's younger brother, picked up the family cat.

Left: The Burrell siblings, Tim, Jamie and Shauna, sit down to dinner at their house near campus.

Dr. Phil proves to David Letterman that he can dish it as well as take it

Making a guest appearance on Letterman's show Monday, Phil McGraw pulled out a note card and read off the list of names he's been called during the late-night talk show host's relentless ribbing over the past few months.

"Pinhead," "evil genius" and "half-baked quack" were among the nicer ones.

Turner Broadcasting head steps down

Turner Broadcasting head Jamie Kellner is stepping down after two years on the job, the latest in a series of high-level management departures from parent AOL Time Warner. AOL chairman Steve Case also plans to step down.

PERSONALITY PROFILE

Jon Wefald
President

1. What would you like to have for dinner tonight?
"A fillet and a baked potato and a salad. That would be the ultimate. I eat quite a few tuna sandwiches."

2. What is in your CD player right now?
"I listen to stations that do the '50s and '60s like Elvis Presley's 'Return to Sender.' Of course, Presley is the king."

3. What car do you drive?
"We're driving a Buick. This one is a light brown, but I prefer black. The Buick is just a very good car."

4. What was the last movie you saw?
"'The Gangs of New York.' I'd give it a B+. I know it's up for a lot of Academy Awards, but I don't know that it reached that level."

5. What is your must-see TV show each week?
"MSNBC. 'The Brian Williams Show.' It's on foreign policy. MSNBC is probably covering the Iraq situation the best. I usually watch about an hour's worth of MSNBC."

6. What is your favorite place to eat?
"It's a toss-up between the country club and Harry's. They are both excellent. There are a lot of good restaurants in Aggieville."

7. Who is your idol?
"My greatest hero would probably be Abraham Lincoln. He was a person from the common folk of America. He ran for office five times and lost. He inherited the job at the biggest crisis time in American history. He saved the Union.."

8. What is your favorite alcoholic drink?
"I have to be honest, I just don't drink. I just don't like it. I stay with coffee and Diet Pepsi and water. I certainly don't mind when people do it, as long as it is done with moderation."

9. What was the craziest thing you did in college?
"I am sure there were several. It didn't exactly happen yesterday, but I can't think of anything right now. I won't deny that there were many crazy things."

10. Have you ever cheated on a test?
"I might have looked over somebody's shoulder once in a while, like in a freshman biology class. But nothing serious."

BAYLOR | Cats aim to play in postseason this year

anything but routine.

Baylor has two conference wins this season, but both came against teams that beat K-State. The Bears defeated Texas A&M and pulled a major upset on Feb. 15 when they beat No. 13 Oklahoma State 74-72.

The Bears are led by a pair of sophomores in guard John Lucas and forward Lawrence Roberts.

Lucas was last seen by Wildcat fans trading three-pointers with Larry Reid in last year's Big 12 Tournament and now leads his team with 14.7 points per outing.

Roberts averages a double-double with 14.4 points and 10.0 rebounds a game. He is the reigning Big 12 Player of the Week after a 20 point, 11 rebound showing in the OSU upset.

While Roberts has proven he can be a force in the post, the Cats will also contend with the Bears' outside shooting. Sophomore Kenny Taylor leads the league in three-pointers per game with 3.3. Baylor shoots 36 percent and is No. 9 in the nation in made three-pointers.

Wooldridge said the Cats will look for the answer to Baylor's sophomores with a hot hand of their own.

He said Frank Richards has emerged from his slump just in time to add a helping hand to the club.

Richards, 1-for-20 from three-point range in K-State's first nine Big 12 games, bounced back against Missouri. He was 2-for-3 from beyond the arc and finished with 20 points. In the last two games, Richards has 10 assists to one turnover. The effort earned him Big 12 Rookie of the Week on Monday.

The about-face did not slip by Wooldridge.

"He had a scoring game at Missouri," he said. "That's been something that's been a little dry for three or four weeks. I'm sure glad to see he's come out of a slump."

Tonight's game becomes even more important considering it's a home game.

The Cats are 9-3 at home this season, but have dropped all five conference road games. When struggling on the road, Wooldridge said defending the backyard becomes all the more important.

"We've played some decent basketball here," he said. "There are still games out there and some adjustments we will see in league play in terms of the standings, so if you don't take care of your home court, you are in trouble."

MISSOURI | Defensive play brings team attention

out.

K-State's leading scorer, Kendra Wecker, managed only 11 points, while Nicole Ohlde (28) and Megan Mahoney (17) picked up the slack.

Stein isn't counting on Wecker having another slump tonight, though.

"I don't foresee Kendra Wecker shooting like that again against us. I think she's going to be fired up to get back on course."

Wecker will line up against the Tigers' best in 6-foot-1 forward Evan Unrau (15.8 ppg, 7.9 rpg).

Unrau had 10 points in the first contest, second only to Missouri senior Kerensa Barr.

"I have a tremendous amount of respect for Evan Unrau. She's one of the hardest-working players in the Big 12," Patterson said. "Every day she takes the floor, she's giving every ounce of what she can to her team and is a major factor in the success of that basketball team this season. Her versatility is very impressive to me."

K-State will look to manage that versatility tonight, when the Cats battle for a share of the Big 12 lead while conference co-leader Texas tangles with Colorado.

The biggest challenge, Patterson said, will be working to reverse the Cats' recent trend toward slow starts.

Oklahoma State nearly nipped K-State on Saturday with an 8-0 run to start the game before the Cats recovered to post their 18th consecutive win at Bramlage Coliseum.

K-State's resilience in that contest gives Patterson confidence that her team can recover if a similar situation plays out tonight.

"The challenge for us right now is establishing consistency," Patterson said, "but I think we've proven that regardless of how we start, we're going to be competitive to the finish."

BASEBALL | Team moves to 3-0 in season play

K-State's offense was ticking early with six runs in the second inning off Creighton's Chris Appuhn (0-1).

After Ryan Baldwin walked to begin the frame, Brett Williams' two-run homer over the right-field scoreboard sparked the Wildcat spurt. The blast was estimated at 425 feet and hit Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

"It felt good," Williams said. "It was supposed to be a hit-and-run, though. I was supposed to hit it on the ground."

K-State didn't mind, however, and Baldwin's two-run, line drive single to left field later in the inning off Jon Gorden made the score 7-0.

"We've got a good lineup," Williams said. "One through nine we're solid."

Solid was the right description for the Cats' offense in the sixth inning, too, when K-State used seven singles off the Bluejays' Brian Furlong to plate five more runs and push the lead to 13-1.

Baldwin had another two-run single in the inning to extend his team-leading RBI tally to 12.

"When runners are on and I'm up, I try to get a hit and get them in and help the team a little bit," Baldwin said.

The Cats got plenty of help from the mound, too.

Six K-State pitchers shared 11 strikeouts, and Creighton managed only six hits on the day. Ripley struck out four and allowed only four hits in his Wildcat debut.

"Jim was very good, very sharp," Clark said. "That's what he's shown us. He has the potential to be a No. 1 for us. He's got good stuff, and he hit his locations. We could have easily gone another inning with him, but we wanted these other guys to get some innings."

Jonathan Gutierrez, who went 5-0 last season as a mid-week and eventual weekend starter, worked a scoreless sixth and seventh for K-State.

Ty Soto's two-run home run to left field finished the Cats' scoring in the seventh inning.

"I was happy with the way the guys responded," Clark said.

"Hopefully we can continue to build and continue to improve."

Wildcat notes

- K-State's 15-2 win Tuesday moved the Cats to 3-0 on the year. The mark matches the team's best start since the inception of the Big 12.
- K-State has now won four in a row against Creighton.
- Brett Williams extended his hitting streak to 14 games with his two-run homer in the second inning.
- Ty Soto pushed his hitting streak to 12 games with a sixth-inning single.
- Pat Maloney reached base for the 36th consecutive game Tuesday when he walked in the second inning.

Additional 20,000 Army troops sent to Gulf

By Matt Kelley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – The Defense Department has activated more than 20,000 more Army troops to be sent to the Persian Gulf as the U.S. military buildup continues for a possible war with Iraq, Pentagon officials said Tuesday.

Deployment orders signed by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld over the weekend will send the Army's 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment and several smaller units to the area around Iraq, where they will join about 150,000 other U.S. forces already in the region.

The other units include an artillery brigade, a combat support hospital, a chemical weapons defense company, a military police unit, "civil affairs" specialists in humanitarian missions and rear area support units, officials said.

The latest deployment is part of a steady stream of American military personnel being sent to the region in case President Bush decides to go to war to topple Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein. Bush has said time is running out for Saddam to give up his banned weapons of mass destruction before U.S. takes military action.

The 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment has more than 300 tanks and armored vehicles, as well as helicopters like the AH-64 Apache. The unit is trained for fast, long-range, armored strikes such as the one analysts say is likely to form the core of any U.S. ground invasion of Iraq.

The regiment, based in Fort Carson, Colo., has about 6,000 soldiers and support staff.

Meanwhile, an Air Force Reserve unit that specializes in airlifting wounded soldiers to military hospitals, among other missions, announced that more than 300 of its personnel have been activated for possible assignment to the Gulf region.

The members of the 445th Airlift Wing, based at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base near Dayton, Ohio, fly and maintain C-141C Starlifter cargo planes. Each plane can carry more than 47 tons of cargo, including either 103 patients with attendants, 168 paratroopers or 208 troops.

The wing has flown about half of the suspected al-Qaeda or Taliban prisoners to the lockup at the U.S. Navy base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

TERROR ALERT | Community prepares smallpox vaccination plan

Kennedy, director of health education and promotion.

She said the country is in phase one of the smallpox vaccination immunization process.

After phase one is completed, which will be when all emergency health care providers are inoculated, then Lafene's health workers will be immunized in the second phase.

The third phase will be when the general public would receive the vaccine.

Kennedy said Lafene does not house the vaccine, so students should not come to the health center if they wish to get smallpox inoculations.

Capt. Robert Mellgren said K-State police had a heightened awareness long before the announcement was made, but haven't done anything different since.

"We've made several preparatory moves to make sure everything is well taken care of," Mellgren said.

"But it's hard to prepare for something that you don't know what to expect, so we try to make ourselves as aware and as prepared as possible."

According to the Associated Press, the CIA believes Iraqi President Saddam Hussein could be planning to launch a terrorist attack on the United States.

An analysis found a 59 percent probability an attack would occur before the end of March, but only a 6 percent chance such an attack would never occur, according to a recent Newsweek article.

House committee endorses Sebelius' education budget

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA – A $1.7 billion higher education budget proposed by Gov. Kathleen Sebelius for the next fiscal year has been endorsed by the House Appropriations Committee.

Spending for public universities, community colleges and vocational schools would remain at current levels under Sebelius' plan.

The budget makes no fresh cuts in higher education. However it neither restores money cut last year nor provides additional funds for rising costs in operations.

The committee's endorsement, on a voice vote Monday, continued a trend this year in which lawmakers are leaving Sebelius' spending recommendations largely untouched.

The committee plans to put most of the fiscal 2004 budget in a bill that is expected to come to a final vote in mid-March.

Committee members said tight revenues and the state's lack of cash reserves have discouraged significant changes in Sebelius' budget proposals.

Ridge: Prepare for the worst

Americans advised to make emergency kits

By John J. Lumpkin
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CINCINNATI – Telling Americans to be ready for terrorist attacks, Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge launched a public relations campaign Wednesday that offers families a few basic steps to prepare for the worst.

The message: Have a communications plan so the family can get in touch during an emergency, put together a disaster kit with a few days of critical supplies, and know where to turn for information during a crisis.

"We will not be afraid. We will be ready," said Ridge, who traveled to Cincinnati to announce the program and meet with safety and emergency workers at the local Red Cross. "Make a kit! Have a plan! Get informed!" he said.

Homeland Security officials said the campaign launch has been a year in the making and not tied to the orange – "High" – terrorism alert that began more than a week ago.

Officials said they crafted the campaign to avoid scaring people while providing some commonsense ideas that will help families find and care for each other when normal government and emergency services aren't available.

Many of these steps are worth taking to prepare for natural disasters, as well, officials said.

This includes keeping a three-day supply of water, food and medicine, Ridge said. Among other things, the government-recommended "kit" also includes duct tape and plastic sheeting Ridge said could be used to seal off a room in the event of a chemical or biological release.

Printing Services' off-campus move to help journalism school meet accreditation standards

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications will gain more than 10,500 square feet in Kedzie Hall when Printing Services moves out of the basement in late May, Printing Services Director Ed Wilburn said.

Printing Services will move to 5980 Corporate Dr., at the Manhattan Industrial Park, near the Manhattan Regional Airport.

The journalism school had been cited in three consecutive accreditation reports for noncompliance in facilities, Todd Simon, director of the school, said. The school undergoes accreditation on a periodic basis and must comply with at least 11 of 12 factors to remain in good standing, Simon said.

Printing Services is being moved to allow the journalism school to have more faculty in one building, which was the only shortfall on the most recent accreditation report, Simon said.

The school now is spread out in six locations across campus, including Kedzie, East Stadium, McCain Auditorium, the K-State Student Union and Dole and Fairchild halls.

"We outgrew this space about 25 years ago. It has limited the type of equipment we can have."

Ed Wilburn
PRINTING SERVICES DIRECTOR

"We'll do the best we can," Simon said. "But consolidating everybody is not a possibility."

The school will inherit about 1,500 square feet of office space and another 9,000 square feet of production space. Simon said the office space will be used for faculty offices, but the use of the additional space is still unclear.

Glenn Hoover, assistant director of Printing Services, said Printing Services' move will cost a minimum of $150,000, the money for which will come from money generated by Printing Services.

The journalism school agreed to help with some of the costs for moving, said John Fairman, assistant vice president for institutional advancement.

The school also will have to come up with the funds to renovate the unfinished portion of the basement, which Simon said probably would be used as lab space. Basic remodeling would cost between $450,000-$600,000, Simon said.

"Our first priority would be to find the money," Simon said. "Once the space is open, we'll start looking at what we can do with it."

Printing Services, meanwhile, will have additional space, and Wilburn said the new location has about twice as much space as the current location, which will allow expansion and improvements.

"We outgrew this space about 25 years ago," Wilburn said. "It has limited the type of equipment we can have."

But Wilburn said relocating might

Enrollment numbers increase

Student population up for 5th consecutive year

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's total spring enrollment has increased for the fifth consecutive year, according to numbers released Wednesday.

Total spring 2003 enrollment increased by 226 students from the 20,409 last spring.

Monty Nielsen, university registrar, said the increase can be attributed to good recruitment efforts, among other reasons.

"The increase in the enrollment reflects very well on our recruitment and retention efforts," he said. "And it speaks well to the caliber and quality of our students in their choosing to attend, return and hopefully get their degree at K-State."

Nielsen said the increase in spring enrollment could be because of the economy.

"During times when the economy isn't as good as other times, the tendency is for higher education to see higher

Technical jobs allow students to earn money while learning about theater

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

CAMPUS JOBS

The Collegian takes a closer look at students who earn their college cash on campus.

The late nights and minimum-wage pay all are worthwhile to Nick Uthoff, sophomore in theater.

Uthoff is one of 13 students employed to work on the technical crew at McCain Auditorium.

"It is definitely a good thing simply for the experience," he said. "I have learned a lot by working there."

Uthoff said he likes the job, which includes working on lighting and sound, for many reasons.

"It is a pretty laid-back job," he said. "If we don't have a lot to do, we can get off early."

He also said he enjoys the way the people he works with treat him.

"There is a very friendly atmosphere," he said. "You really get to know the people you are working with."

Uthoff said one of the most exciting parts of the job is getting ready for big shows that come through.

"We load in the big shows," he said. "A crew will come with a semi, and we will unload everything needed for the show that night."

Kyle McGruffin, technical director, said the students are always excited for big shows.

"They like it when we have famous people come in," he said. "And sometimes they get to meet them."

Salina students use SafeRide program for transportation

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students at K-State-Salina now have an alternative to driving after drinking or riding with someone who has been drinking since SafeRide was implemented Feb. 5.

Lynsey Burnett, K-State-Salina student body president, said it has been a long time in the making.

"Both campuses have been trying to get it started for the past five years," she said. "Committees have battled over the cost and how it would be paid for."

Burnett said she decided it was time to do something about it.

"This was a goal for my vice president and myself this year," she said. "We formed a committee and discussed different options and which one would be the best.

"We called different cab companies, and only one would even agree to consider working with us. We ended up working with them and wrote a policy," she said.

The policy is posted online and states that before they can use SafeRide, students must show proof of current address and a K-State ID card. The address must be inside city limits.

The passenger also must fill out a form, recording pickup and destination, name, ID number, mileage and signature.

"An important thing is that all

SPOTLIGHT | Mr. K-State

Barrett continues work at K-State after career as athlete, coach, athletic director

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you've ever wondered who the statue outside of Bramlage Coliseum is of, it's Mr. K-State himself – Ernie Barrett.

Barrett and K-State go all the way back to the late 1940s and early 1950s, President Jon Wefald said.

"He came to K-State to play basketball in 1947," Wefald said. "He was very good – good enough to be an All-American player, good enough to be on a team that was second in the NCAA and good enough to play for the Boston Celtics."

Barrett did do all of those things, but he also has done much more.

After serving as a first lieutenant in the Air Force for two years, then playing for the Celtics for two years, Barrett had the opportunity to come back to K-State.

"I came back as the assistant basketball coach, and I remained in that job from 1956 to 1963," he said. "In 1964, I became the assistant athletic director and the athletic director in 1969, where I remained for seven years."

After a short venture into private business, Barrett came back to K-State once again.

"I came back in 1989 as the director of development, and that is what I am still doing," he said.

Since then, Barrett has been involved in almost all of the athletic fund-raising done at K-State.

"I was involved in raising money to build KSU's football stadium," he said.

"We were the first school in the Big Eight Conference to put in synthetic turf," Barrett said. "It's something I'm quite proud of, because we got 4,603 individuals to donate $18.75 per yard to be able to pay for it.

"That was one of my very first fund-raising challenges. I really wanted K-State to be the first."

Barrett also was responsible for raising money for Vanier Football Complex, Frank Myers Field and the R.V. Christian Track and Field Complex.

He now he deals with donors and raises money for special projects.

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN
Ernie Barrett, also known as Mr. K-State, poses outside Bramlage Coliseum next to the statue that commemorates his dedication to the university.

"I get to travel a lot," he said. "I usually put about 40-45,000 miles on my car a year. I travel in-state a lot, as well as to Missouri, Oklahoma and Colorado.

"It's something I really enjoy because I've met a lot of people who are interested in K-State and its success – not only athletically, but academically."

The core of donors are alumni, Barrett said.

"We have a great many friends that have enjoyed the success of our football program, as well as the success of all of our other sports."

Barrett has a way with people, Wefald said.

"Ernie Barrett has friends all over, and he makes new ones everywhere he goes," Wefald said. "And when he asks them to help out, they do. He is an excellent fund-raiser – probably one of the greatest that the university has ever seen," he said.

Barrett said he is proud to be able to work with K-State.

"This has been a terrific journey for me because I have been able to continue working with this program for such a long time and will continue to for as long as I can."

O'Hara, Stryker name 4 initiatives as platform's achievement goals

Improving wait-list procedures, funding diversity programs among pair's plans

John O'Hara

Travis Stryker

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

John O'Hara and Travis Stryker are running for student body president and vice president and are using the university's revenue from increased tuition to fuel their campaign.

"Travis and I understand the financial situation of the university, the state of Kansas, and, more importantly, the financial situation of the students," O'Hara, junior in finance, said.

"We are not here to propose some plan that we'd have to charge students more money for – it's not the year for that.

"What we've done is, come up with four realistic initiatives – four initiatives we know we can get done over the course of a one-year term."

The pair's first issue is changing K-State's wait-list procedure. Students pay $9 per credit hour for technology, and although K-State is working on a new student information system, O'Hara said it is a four-year project, and he said he wants to see reform in the wait-listing procedures now.

"We can't wait another four years to see this problem get solved," O'Hara said.

O'Hara and Stryker also are focusing on increasing diversity at K-State.

Stryker, senior in architectural engineering, said that as the privilege fee committee chair, he was able to work with Student Senate to allocate an additional $14,000 to different multicultural student organizations.

He said that although the multicultural groups do a good job of raising funds, they often are too small to raise enough money to produce the size of events they'd like.

"With the administration challenging these groups to put on diverse programming, we'd like to see some financial support from the administration," Stryker said. "We want to take that additional revenue they're getting from increased tuition and put it back toward increased diversity on campus."

Stryker also talked about using that revenue to raise the pay of student employees and graduate teaching assistants.

He said the more-than 4,000 student employees are a great resource to K-State. However, Stryker said, they are paid minimum wage.

Stryker said the University of Kansas is taking initiative to allocate money from increased tuition revenue to student employees.

"We've talked to the administration, and we're wanting to see the same here," he said.

Stryker said that on average, KU also pays its GTAs a couple thousand dollars more per year than K-State.

"This means we're losing GTAs to neighboring schools, and we're also having more of a challenge recruiting additional GTAs because they're overworked and underpaid," he said.

The pair's other platform issue is changing the Dead Week policy.

O'Hara said Faculty Senate is in the process of changing the policy from prohibiting tests five days before Finals Week to seven days.

However, the pair said there is a bigger issue than what Faculty Senate is dealing with.

O'Hara said the fact that students are given quizzes, papers and projects the week before final exams is contradictory to what Dead Week was intended for.

"Why are we calling it a Dead Week? Because clearly, it's not," O'Hara said.

"We need to allow students the opportunity to properly prepare for their finals. We don't want to see quizzes, projects or papers during Dead Week."

O'Hara and Stryker said their Dead Week policy would include an exception clause that would allow professors to ask for approval to give a project or quiz from either Provost James Coffman or Faculty Senate's academic affairs committee.

O'Hara said that, if elected, the pair's main goal would be to make K-State a better place.

"At the end of the term, if we could look back and say, 'There are visible improvements as a result of the increase in the tuition revenue,' then we'd have done our job," he said.

Primary Elections

This is the fourth in a five-day series profiling, in alphabetical order, the platforms of the candidates running for student body president and vice president.

Primary elections will be Feb. 25 and 26.

Number of incoming students with dual credit increases

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chad Bontrager had one year of college out of the way before he ever set foot on a college campus.

Bontrager, senior in milling science, has become part of a growing trend for incoming college students who are receiving college credit while in high school by taking concurrent or dual credit hours – classes that count for both high school and college credit.

Bontrager attended Holton High School, where he received 37 hours from Highland Community College. He said he took the basic courses and found the program very beneficial.

"I was able to move right into my core college classes," he said.

Larry Moeder, director of admissions and student financial assistance, said that in the last five years, K-State has seen an increase of students getting college credit before attending the university.

"The volume of transcripts we receive has dramatically increased," he said.

Cloud County Community College also has been witness to this trend.

JoAnne Balthazor, coordinator of concurrent enrollment, said Cloud County has 34 high schools that partner with them to provide college credits to high school juniors and seniors.

"We have 1,200 students taking credits through Cloud County at their local high schools," she said.

The requirements for the program include that the teachers must have a master's degree or 18 hours of graduate school hours in the subject they teach. She said the students typically are juniors or seniors, but gifted sophomore students are allowed to take classes as well.

"It's an excellent opportunity for good students. They are in class anyway, so this way they can save money and get ahead," Balthazor said.

She said half of the high schools that Cloud County covers buy the books for their students. Another benefit is that classes taught at the high schools cost $48.50 per credit hour, while those taken on campus cost $56 per credit hour.

In addition, Balthazor said the students can live at home, which saves a large amount of money.

However, teachers said the program might cause problems to the number of students who attend the college.

Balthazor said some of the professors at Cloud County have complained about the dual-credit classes decreasing their enrollment.

She said she does not feel this is the case.

"Much of them are students in the top-10 percent of their classes," Balthazor said. "They would have went straight to the universities. We are catching revenue we would have previously lost."

Another concern has been that students who take classes that build on one another will be at a disadvantage if they don't take them all at the same place.

Ray Hightower, assistant dean of student affairs, said engineering students who don't achieve a 29 on the math section of their ACTs should take college algebra or trigonometry. In addition, they need to take these courses at a university, he said.

"Students that take math as outreach courses or not on the main campus of a college or university tend to have problems," he said. "Those classes are too weak."

Because of this concern, universities are mandating that courses with two parts be taken at the same place, Balthazor said.

Although there might be some problems with the system, a number of area high schools said they are happy with the program.

Larry Carpenter, guidance counselor for Riley County USD 378, said the district has 52 students taking classes through Cloud County who are benefiting from the courses.

"It has opened new doors for our students," he said.

Carpenter said some students are graduating with 12 to 14 hours. In addition, many high school sophomores might have the chance to graduate with almost a year of college credit.

At Manhattan High School, 45 students are enrolled in classes at the K-State campus, Nancy Wilson, guidance counselor, said.

In addition, Wilson said some students have taken classes at Wamego or driven to Junction City, where Cloud County offers classes because they are cheaper.

Overall, Balthazor said the dual credit program has been successful – especially with the students.

"Most students are very happy they took the classes," she said.

Students urged to take advantage of prominent senator's lecture

By Katie Copeland
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

U.S. Sen. Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., will present the 127th Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

"It's a chance for students to hear one of the most prominent and outspoken Senate leaders at a crucial moment in our history," said Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series.

Since his 1996 election to the Senate, Hagel has been involved in three Senate committees: Foreign Relations; Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs; and the Select Committee on Intelligence. Hagel also has served as the co-chairman of the Congressional-Executive Commission on China.

Chuck Hagel
U.S. SENATOR
R-NEB.

"He's been widely interviewed on television, news programs and quoted in newspapers," Reagan said, "because he is urging President Bush to be cautious about the war with Iraq.

"Sen. Hagel was enthusiastic in his acceptance of our invitation because he came here with Senator (John) McCain in 1999," Reagan said.

Hagel's topic for the lecture has not yet been announced.

Dale Herspring, professor of political science, will be attending the lecture in hopes of hearing Hagel's views on the upcoming action against Saddam Hussein.

"I want to see where he is on the political spectrum on this one," Herspring said.

Both Reagan and Herspring, who said they attend all of the Landon Lectures, urge all students to take advantage of the lecture.

"I think it is in their interest to hear a variety of viewpoints from key decision makers," Herspring said. "That is what education is supposed to be about."

Hagel is just one of many prominent figures invited to speak at the Landon Lecture Series each year. The series, which began in 1966 in honor of Alfred M. Landon, draws politicians, journalists, cabinet members and others who play key roles in public issues.

"Without fear of contradiction, no university has a lecture series like this," Reagan said.

The lecture, which is open to students, faculty and the community, also will be broadcast live on the Web at www.dce.ksu.edu/landon.

TO THE POINT

Chemical attack instructions instill more fear

Secretary of Homeland Security Tom Ridge's warnings regarding possible attacks on U.S. soil seem to be playing off the fears of Americans.

Ridge's instructions to have duct tape and plastic sheeting on hand in the event of a chemical attack not only instill more fear and confusion in Americans, but also do not give clear warning signs of how Americans will know if a chemical attack is occurring.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Ridge and his staff are trying to appease citizens' desires to have a purpose – to be able to do something about the war on terrorism. Instead, citizens are more confused and more fearful than before alerts were issued.

Maybe being ignorant and being able to live life normally might not be a bad thing for Americans. Ridge and the Bush administration need to issue more clear warnings instead of giving a percent-chance that a terrorist attack may occur. The need for information regarding possible attacks is crucial, but clear evidence and more solid information need to be given in order to prevent a fearful America.

CAMPUS FOURUM
395-4444

President Bush is going to pay attention to what the American people think about the war or the economy. He knows most of us didn't vote for him anyway.

The government is blatantly lying about pot.

What would Geronimo say if he jumped out of an airplane?

Who would win in a fight? The Geiko gecko or a K-State mullet squirrel?

I'm sorry I was late to class, teacher. I was too busy reading the sidewalk chalk.

I saw a squirrel walking around campus saying "Aflac."

Does anyone else find function bidding pointless and demeaning?

Guess those protesters are still mad their cousins in Florida forgot how to vote.

All the people from Western Kansas: It's time to let your buns down. Literally, in your hair. OK?

There's fat girls. Then there's hot fat girls.

To the people complaining about video-game violence: I want to play the video game Hitler played. You know, the one that made him so violent?

Three horses don't make an octopus.

You're not drunk until you have to sit down to pee.

Why aren't Michael Jackson's kids half black?

Alcohol is the essence of beer. And beer is the essence of drunkenness.

My roommate wants to go irrigating on a date. Do we have any takers?

To the girl who showed us your boobs because we convinced you it was Mardi Gras: our bad, sorry. By the way, we did fall in love with you.

To the person that said we shouldn't go to war with Iraq: get all the information, and then tell me that.

NASRINA BURNETT

If a guy dresses too well, he's gay.

If a girl is too good at sports, she's gay.

These assumptions are ridiculous.

Why is it that our society places so many restrictions on what a person of a particular gender can or can't be? Characteristics are divided into categories of male and female. Anytime someone deviates from this formula, it automatically is assumed they are gay.

Gender stereotypes are restricting and harmful to everyone. It doesn't matter if you are a man or woman, gay or straight. These stereotypes do not benefit anyone.

The first way in which gender stereotypes are harmful is the way they limit human potential. These restrictions say, if you are of gender A, you may not possess characteristic B even if you have natural tendencies toward B and are very happy being B.

To simplify, let's imagine a young boy about six years old.

This little boy loves trucks, video games and dancing.

His parents buy him trucks and video games to play with but don't dare to let him take a dance class.

They know that if they let their son take a dance class, he will be made fun of by his peers. Even if the boy is heterosexual, he will be called gay. He will be mocked as a sissy and a girl.

Should a person be restricted in this way? Is it right to say that a male must fit a certain formula and a female must fit another? We're talking about people here, not geometric figures. Is it so wrong to have a little girl want to grow up to be a soldier? Should we discourage a little boy who wants to be a stay-at-home dad when he grows up? If we're going to claim to be a society that believes in freedom, maybe we should start practicing what we preach.

The second harmful result of gender stereotypes is the way they demean women.

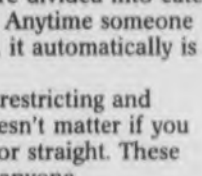
The existence of gender stereotypes is rooted in the belief that stereotypical female characteristics are negative, while stereotypical male characteristics are positive.

How did this formula for gender roles come about? They have been created through the subtle devaluation of what have been traditionally considered female characteristics. All of these insults are targeted at emasculation. By reducing a male to a female he is demeaned in the most harmful way possible. The message here is that being female is inferior and something to be ashamed of.

This implies that if a female is to be valued, she must try to adopt the typically masculine characteristics, but this is the double edge of the sword. When a female acts in ways that are acceptable for a male, she is again devalued.

For example, promiscuity is accepted and often advocated for males. Meanwhile, if a female acts in a similar fashion she is labeled as a slut. Gender stereotypes are rooted in hypocrisy. If a woman acts like a traditional woman, she cannot be as valuable as a man. If a woman acts like a man, she is still rejected. How can a woman operate in this system and still form a sense of positive identity?

The third way gender stereotypes are harmful is the way that they isolate and target homosexuals.



By labeling anyone who steps out of their gender's constraints as gay two things are implied. First, that being gay is unacceptable; and second, that sexuality is dictated by how well a person fits into gender stereotypes.

Regardless of personal beliefs, rejecting homosexuality on the basis of traditional gender roles is unacceptable. Similarly, deeming all who dare to defy gender stereotypes as gay is just plain irrational. Nobody has the right to make assumptions about another person's sexuality.

Gender stereotypes restrict and devalue. Regardless of gender or sexual orientation, these stereotypes need to be rejected.

President not concerned with nation's well-being, instead focused on war

GUEST COLUMN BY PAUL WHITE

I know what you are saying out there – another Paul White anti-war banter. Didn't the Collegian fire that guy? Didn't that guy quit? Didn't that guy leak a slew of videos on the Internet that make R. Kelly's and Tommy Lee's home video escapades look like Disney movies?

I'm amazed they let me do this column, seeing as how I don't hang out with the Collegianites. I'm not racist nor do I write about how I have a harder time getting laid than concrete.

Anyone miss "America! the comic" (www.corrupting theyouth.com)?

Remember when the Dow Jones was around 11,000 when cigar aficionado Bill Clinton left office and how now it's taking dips below 7,600?

Anyone think it might have something to do with our president completely offending the international and Arab community? No investment and no job creation equals layoffs and unemployed college graduates.

Say what you want about liberals, but look at this president's record-high fiscal policy, blatant disregard of the U.S. Constitution, worthless foreign policy and careless use of the U.S. military. I know of no other president more liberal in those regards.

Anyone think preemptive attacks on our "enemies" are a good idea?

Remember Pearl Harbor? Our country sure did like preemptive attacks back then.

Are we prepared to see the international community dragged into chaos by the world's leading superpower invading a nation because we think hypothetically they could harm us at an undetermined time in the future? What country aren't we alienating and upsetting in the process?

It is amazing to see Bush sell this thing, because for some reason, his record with the Texas Air National Guard shows that he didn't show up for his last 12 months of service (www.motherjones.com).

What a way to make up for lost time.

This cat is so addicted to Saddam Hussein that when asked who Kim Jong-Il was, his most likely response is that she is the new female protege produced by the Shady/Aftermath Records.

Anyone got duct tape left over from the phony terror warning designed to scare protesters away from New York City and Washington last weekend?

I'm surprised no one has used some to shut up the Department of Justice, its Patriot Act 2 and its scare tactics.

I'm also waiting for the CIA and the State Department to fabricate another bin Laden tape where he takes credit for weather control and the recent East Coast blizzards. You know, another incident like last week where they claimed al-Jazeera will play a tape, before al-Jazeera ever knew one existed?

Didn't look like anything scared the 20-plus blocks of protesters in New York.

There haven't been crowds like that mobilized since a week before when that new 50-cent banger dropped.

Bottom line, as invasion dates already have been inked, our president, who supposedly is all about saving American lives, prefers neverending wars over guaranteeing health-care benefits for his citizens. Which do you think would save more lives?

Plane carrying 302 elite Iranian soldiers crashes

By Ali Akbar Dareini
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TEHRAN, Iran – An Iranian military plane carrying 302 members of the elite Revolutionary Guards crashed in the mountains of southeastern Iran on Wednesday, killing all on board in the country's worst plane crash ever, state-run media reported.

The plane was en route from Zahedan, on the Pakistan border, to Kerman, about 500 miles southeast of Tehran, state-run Tehran television reported. It crashed in a mountainous area about 20 miles from its destination.

The Russian-made Antonov airliner operated by Turkey's military lost contact with the control tower at 5:30 p.m. Wednesday, according to the reports.

The official Islamic Republic News Agency said rescuers had reached the crash site and that all 302 people on board had been killed, making the crash the deadliest in Iran's history. The death toll surpassed the 290 killed July 3, 1988, when an Iran Air A300 Airbus was shot down over the Persian Gulf by the USS Vincennes.

The agency said the plane's passengers and crew all were members of the Revolutionary Guards. Earlier reports said 270 were aboard, but the latest media updates didn't explain the increase.

State television and radio did not offer reasons for the crash and did not address the possibility of terrorism. There was heavy snowfall in many parts of Iran on Wednesday, including in Zahedan, which hadn't seen snow in three years.

Associated Press efforts to reach provincial officials were unsuccessful early Thursday.

Tehran television quoted an anonymous official as saying the forces had visited the impoverished Sistan-Baluchestan province, of which Zahedan is the capital, for an important mission.

The Revolutionary Guards, under the direct control of supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, are seen as the defenders of Iran's Islamic regime. The guards protect Iran's borders and defend ruling hardliners in this ultra-conservative society.

The government issued a statement offering condolences to the families of the victims, television and radio reports said.

Iranians were preparing for an Islamic holiday Thursday, the feast of Velayat, when Shiites believe Islam's prophet Mohammad appointed his son-in-law, Ali, as his successor.

Wednesday's crash was the latest in a string of air disasters in Iran mostly involving Russian-built aircraft.

A Ukrainian An-140 aircraft flew into a mountainside Dec. 23, 2002, while preparing to land at an airport near the central city of Isfahan, killing all the estimated 46 scientists aboard.

In February 2002, a Russian-made Tupolev Tu-154 airliner, carrying 119 people, smashed into snow-covered mountains not far from its destination of Khorramabad, 230 miles southwest of Tehran.

U.S., Britain to present new deadline for Iraqi cooperation

By Edith M. Lederer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS – Facing global opposition to a rush to war, the United States and Britain will introduce a new U.N. resolution in the coming days and set a deadline for Iraq to cooperate with weapons inspectors, Britain's U.N. ambassador said Wednesday.

Diplomats said the resolution will declare Iraq in material breach of its obligations to disarm, a requirement for any military action. The two allies will present the deadline separately and will demand a decision on the resolution in two or three weeks, said the U.S. and British diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The diplomats said the deadline would put all parties on notice that war was looming unless Iraq demonstrates it is actively cooperating with inspections.

British Ambassador Jeremy Greenstock said the draft resolution will force the Security Council, which strongly supports continued inspections, to decide whether to authorize military action or to continue inspections if the Iraqi government begins to disarm.

He predicted that debate over this crunch decision would go beyond March 1, when chief U.N. weapons inspector Hans Blix is due to present his next written report to the council. That would put back the U.S. timetable for a possible war, ruling out February and its optimum weather conditions.

Diplomats acknowledged that a U.S.-British resolution still lacks the necessary nine votes it needs to be adopted by the Security Council, and there is still no guarantee that France, Russia or China, which favor continued inspections, would refrain from vetoing a new resolution.

U.S. and British officials said the final language in the resolution has not yet been decided on by President Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair but that both sides were close to agreement.

In Washington, White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said Bush "intends to work with our friends and allies to offer a resolution either this week or next."

But the council is bitterly divided over Iraq's cooperation with the terms of Resolution 1441, passed Nov. 27, which gave Baghdad a final opportunity to disarm or face serious consequences.

DAMAGING LOSS

Postseason hopes diminish in home defeat

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It couldn't have come at a worse time for Coach Jim Wooldridge and the Wildcats.

A must-win opportunity at home against Baylor was lost Wednesday night when K-State fell to the Bears 66-57 at Bramlage Coliseum.

The loss left players and coaches searching for answers afterwards.

"I don't know that we've played this way all year," Wooldridge said. "This is a bad time for it to happen."

Baylor (12-10, 3-8) made one field goal in the final 9:34, but relied on a 13-point cushion it had built as K-State (12-12, 3-8) scored just 10 points in the first 10 minutes of the second half.

The Wildcats cut the lead to four with 1:04 remaining in the game, but three-point shooting was once again the downfall, as K-State shot 18.2 percent from behind the arc on the night.

Senior Matt Siebrandt led the Wildcats with 18 points.

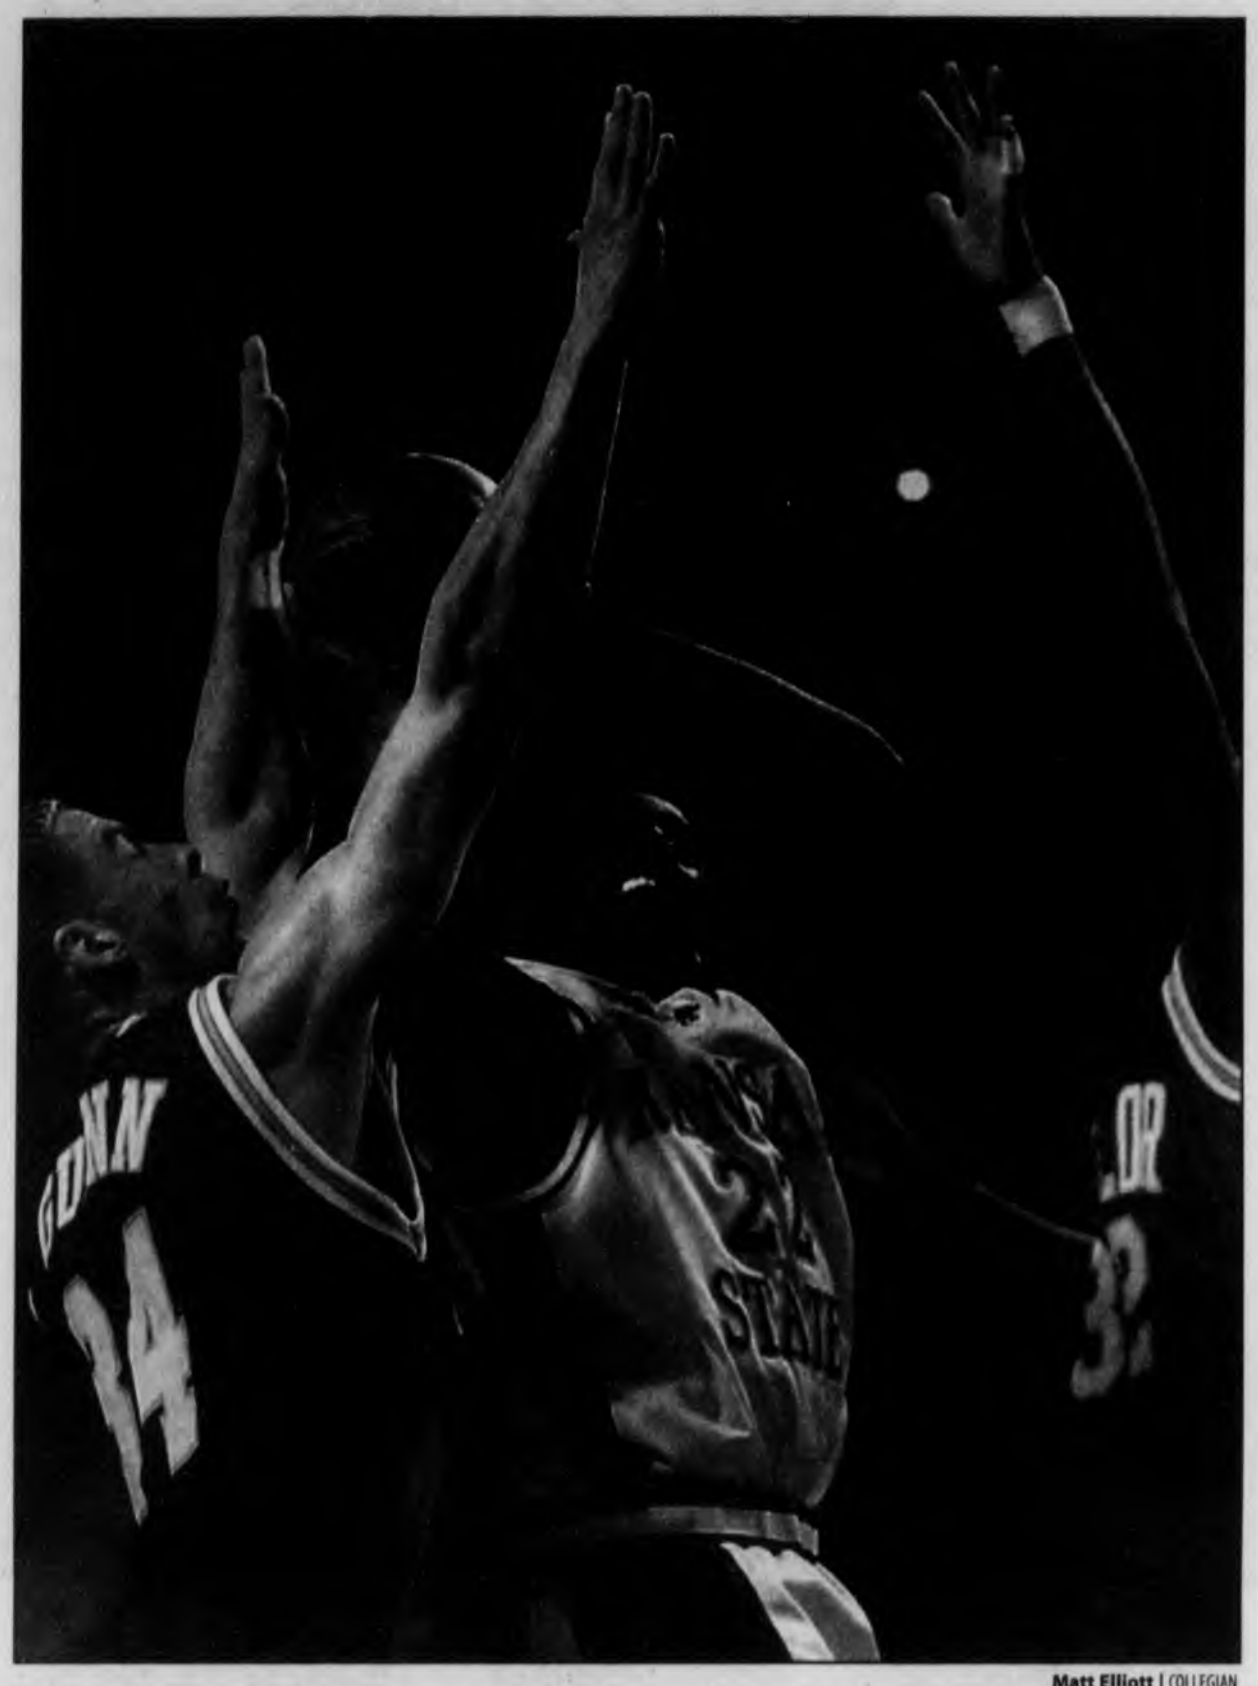
"You would think there would be more a lot more energy on our end," Siebrandt said. "We didn't bring it until about five minutes left, when we were in danger of losing."

K-State trailed 32-29 going into halftime, after Baylor forward Lawrence Roberts sank a three-pointer to beat the buzzer.

But it could have been that shot that demoralized the Cats.

The Bears came out of the locker room on a 13-5 run, a streak K-State would never be able to overcome.

"I thought we lost our confidence early in the game and just couldn't find a way to regain it," Wooldridge said. "I am not sure we had one possession early on where we looked very comfortable or very confident."



K-State did shoot better in the second half, but poor free-throw shooting and turnovers were the demise of the Cats after intermission, as 11 turnovers led to easy baskets for the Bears.

Baylor's big men also were the key on the night, as Lawrence and R.T. Guinn outscored Siebrandt and Pervis Pasco 32-20.

"Baylor deserved to win," guard Frank Richards said. "They outplayed us, and we just weren't ready for this."

Junior guard Jarrett Hart said something has

Turnovers, poor free-throw shooting prevent Wildcat comeback

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A poor performance in one half now could mean no postseason for K-State.

Down just three at halftime, turnovers and poor shooting from the free throw line kept the Wildcats (12-12, 3-8) from coming back on Baylor Wednesday night as K-State lost 66-57 at Bramlage Coliseum.

When the Bears' Lawrence Roberts hit a three-pointer with no time left on the clock in the first half, K-State lost any momentum it had, momentum – and a lead – it never would regain.

"I want to give that team a lot of credit," guard Jarrett Hart said of Baylor. "They came out on our floor in a hostile environment and played well together. They did the little things today to win the game, and we didn't."

Although trailing by merely a basket, K-State came out in the second half with no energy. The Wildcats committed 11 turnovers in the final 20 minutes, while also struggling from the free-throw line – missing 9-of-13 from the line in the second half.

"We just fell apart," forward Matt Siebrandt said. "We didn't make any free throws, and we just killed ourselves all night long. We dug to deep of a hole and that was the ballgame.

"It's disappointing because this was a big game as far as our future plans."

Coach Jim Wooldridge said that the game was a low-point of the season, and that it couldn't have come at a worse time.

"The problems that we had at the free throw line, the turnovers – we had missed opportunities on the inside on some open looks that we had," he said.

Junior Frank Richards said the blame shouldn't be put on one player.

"I thought we were past this stage of playing like this," he said. "I thought we were past this learning stage. For us to come out and play like this is ugly.

"I felt like we played selfish tonight, on both ends," Richards said. "We've just got to get everybody back on the same page. On the defensive end, we didn't give each other help and on the offensive end, we tried to do too much one-on-one."

Three point shooting again plagued K-State, shooting worse than 25 percent for the fourth time in the last five games. The Cats made only two of 11 attempts Wednesday night.

"We just haven't been knocking them down," guard

COLUMBIA, Mo. – Missouri coach Cindy Stein said earlier in the week that her team would try any and all defenses to stop K-State on Wednesday night.

If the Cats' 66-56 win over the Tigers at the Hearnes Center was any indication, there might not be a defense good enough to match K-State's penchant for scoring.

The Wildcats (24-2, 11-1) hit nine of their first 14 against Missouri's zone to race to a 21-8 lead to start the contest.

Then K-State fought through the Tigers' (13-10, 7-5) man-to-man attack to extend the margin to as many as 17 in the first half on way to the Cats' sixth-straight win.

"I have the highest regard for Kansas State," Stein said. "I think we gave them everything we could."

Sophomore Megan Mahoney led all scorers with 21, and Naismith Award finalists Nicole Ohlde and Kendra Wecker pitched in 17 and 18, respectively, as K-State won for the fourth-straight time over Missouri and recorded its second series sweep of a Big 12 opponent this season.

"Our main goal was just to come out aggressive and to run through our offense," Wecker said. "We got some shots to fall down early, and we got some good looks. We ran through our offense like we needed to, executed and got the looks we were hoping for."

The Cats might have started hot from the field, but by midway through the half, both teams were ice cold.

Mahoney's 13 points in the first frame were the difference, but K-State struggled as a team during the first 20 minutes.

The Cats went 12-of-32, but Missouri's 8-for-28 mark was worse, as K-State took a 34-17 lead to the break.

The Cats found their groove against an aggressive Tiger press in the second half. A Mahoney transition bucket at the 18:42 mark extended the lead to 20, but Missouri wasn't done yet.

"They were at home," Coach Deb Patterson said. "They had some momentum."

Momentum allowed Missouri to fight back to within 11 four minutes later.

"We just had some breakdowns," Mahoney said. "We didn't talk on some switches, and

Four years after leaving Oregon State for the NFL, Mike Riley has rejoined the Beavers as head coach, a university spokesman said Wednesday night.

Riley, who spent last year as an assistant with the New Orleans Saints, will be introduced at press conference Thursday, said Steve Fenk, an assistant sports information director.

Riley, head coach of the San Diego Chargers from 1999-2001, replaces Dennis Erickson, who left Oregon State to become head coach of the San Francisco 49ers.

The school said Riley contacted athletic director Bob De Carolis the day it was announced that Erickson was leaving.

Proper nutrition important for vegetarians' health

By Wendy Gorman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Steak. Hamburgers. Chicken strips. Ribs.

By and large, Americans eat a lot of meat. So how do vegetarians adjust their habits to fulfill their dietary needs in the fast-food-dominated culture?

Laura Davisson, senior in history, was a vegetarian for two years in high school, but said she missed hamburgers the most.

Davisson said she became a vegetarian because of her concerns for animal rights. She and her family ran into some difficulties with the situation.

"It was hard for my parents to accommodate," Davisson said. "They had to feed me, then feed the rest of my family."

Adopting a vegetarian status involves not only societal adjustments, but also careful dietary monitoring.

"You need to put thought into crafting a vegetarian diet," said Karen Hudson, registered dietitian and Family Nutrition Program coordinator for K-State Research and Extension. "There is a caveat in that just because you're eating a vegetarian diet doesn't necessarily mean you're eating healthfully."

Though vegetarianism has the potential to be a very healthy lifestyle, it can cause deficits in essential nutrients. Billie Gish, registered nurse at the Center for Nutrition and Preventative Medicine, said getting good sources of protein can pose a problem for vegetarians.

"You have to look to things like beans and soy products to fill that void," Gish said.

Hudson also said strict vegetarianism could cause a lack in vitamins B-12 and D. She said she suggests finding alternate sources for the vitamins.

"If they are 'purist' vegetarians, meaning vegan, and they stay away from all meat products, I would recommend they start their day with a bowl of fortified cereal. Many of the vitamins typically found in meat products can be fortified in cereals. Then, if they top that off with fortified soy milk and include some fortified orange juice, it's even better."

Though staying healthy was a factor Davisson had to take into consideration, she said it was never a big problem for her.

"I had to try harder in terms of taking vitamins to make sure I was healthy," she said. "Mostly, it worried my mom a lot. It wasn't like I just got lazy and gave up."

In many ways, vegetarians do benefit from their eating habits, Hudson said. Vegetarian diets lower a person's risk for various health problems, including cardiovascular disease, hypertension and obesity.

Gish also said the vegetarian lifestyle could be a good idea.

"Eliminating the animal fats from your diet is very healthy, and including soy products as part of a vegetarian diet gives you the benefits of soy products," Gish said.

Die-hard meat eaters might want to consider following some examples of vegetarians.

"Most of us can do well to adopt more of a plant-based diet," Hudson said. "Probably the compromise we can make is to follow a plant-based diet, but add a little chicken and fish. Then you get the best of both worlds."

She did caution against making a sudden, drastic change from omnivore to herbivore.

"Vegetarians typically get more fiber, and that you have to build up gradually because your gastrointestinal system will fight you. Introduce new foods a little at a time. Your body will appreciate it."

Though Davisson chose not to stick with her vegetarian diet, she still has the same values, she said.

"I found other ways to support animal rights."

The vegetarian lifestyle

For more information on being a healthy vegetarian check out www.vrg.org and www.eatright.org.

Definitions for common categories of vegetarians

- Vegans eat only foods that are plant-based. They consume no meat, poultry or fish, nor animal products such as milk, cheese, butter and eggs.
- Lacto-vegetarians are vegetarians who include dairy products in their diets, but no eggs.
- Lacto-ovo vegetarians include both dairy products and eggs in their diets.
- Pollo-vegetarians include poultry in their diets.
- Pesca-vegetarians include fish and other seafood in the diet.
- Sometimes-vegetarians choose mainly a plant-centered diet, with small amounts of animal-derived products consumed less frequently.

Necessary nutrients

The nutrients most likely to be lacking in a vegetarian diet include vitamin B12, vitamin D, calcium, iron and zinc.

- Vitamin B12: Breakfast cereals, soy-milk products, and vegetarian-burger patties are often fortified with vitamin B12. Getting enough B12 generally is not a concern for vegetarians who eat dairy products or eggs.
- Vitamin D: Milk is naturally high in vitamin D; vegans should look for breakfast cereals and soy beverages fortified with the nutrient.
- Calcium: If you regularly consume milk, cheese and yogurt, your calcium intake should be adequate. Those avoiding dairy products can opt for green leafy vegetables, calcium-fortified orange juice and fortified soy milk and soy cheese.
- Iron: Reach for legumes, dark-green leafy vegetables, iron-fortified cereals and bread, whole-grain products, seeds, prune juice, dried fruit and black-strap molasses. Keep in mind that eating a Vitamin C-rich food at every meal will help your body absorb the type of iron that's found in plant sources.
- Zinc: Whole grains, especially germ and bran (note that grains processed into refined flour lose zinc), whole-wheat bread, legumes, tofu, seeds and nuts are good sources of zinc.

IN BRIEF

Staff Reports

Manhattan Arts Center to have "Over The River and Through the Woods"

The first showing of this comedy will be at 8 p.m. Friday at the Manhattan Arts Center and will run through Sunday. The play also will be performed Feb. 27-28 and March 1-2. The price of the show is $11 for adults, $8 for students and $5 for children. On Feb. 23 and 27 and March 2, there will be a special student price of $5 if students show their ID card.

The play is about an Italian-American family that consists of two sets of grandparents and their grandson, Nick. They spend every Sunday afternoon having lunch with one another. One day, Nick breaks the news that he has received a new job and is going to move. The grandparents are heartbroken and decide to come up with a plan to change his mind. They introduce him to a girl, and this is where the conflicts start.

THEATER | McCain workers say experience more important than pay

Uthoff said his favorite show so far was the very first show he worked on.

"'Tap Dogs' was a really good show and a really good first experience for me," he said. "It was fun to watch it all come together."

McGruffin said he thinks the experience is always really good for the students.

"They don't get paid a whole heck of a lot," he said, "so it's obviously something that they must like doing."

McGruffin said being involved with the shows is the best part of the job for most of the students.

"It's challenging, but it's also fun," he said.

However, the job is not all glamour and glitz, Uthoff said.

"In between big shows, we do a lot of glorified custodial work," he said, "but that is a part of keeping the theater running."

Uthoff said that even though he's only a sophomore, he feels like he's one of the more experienced workers at McCain.

"I'm one of the younger people on the crew, but since I have been there for a year, there's kind of a chain of command," he said.

"On the days big shows are coming in, we work all day and sometimes into the night, but it's worth it."

Nick Uthoff
SOPHOMORE IN THEATER

Along with the hard work, Uthoff said the job also includes some late hours.

"On the days big shows are coming in, we work all day and sometimes into the night," he said, "but it's worth it."

Uthoff said the practical experience he is learning definitely is a positive thing for a theater major.

However, McGruffin said officials are not just looking for theater majors to work at McCain.

"I think that even if you do not have a lot of experience, it's a fun thing to do," he said. "We are always looking for people who can work with us."

PREPARE | Ad campaign urges public to 'be ready' for possible attack

"Stash away the duct tape – don't use it!" Ridge said.

With shades of the duck-and-cover campaigns of the Cold War, the Homeland Security blitz will include television public-service announcements and fliers that will be distributed with Yellow Pages phone directories.

Brochures can be obtained at post offices or by calling 1-800-Be-Ready. Also, a new Web site, www.ready.gov, is online.

The television spots will feature Ridge prominently, along with some New York City firefighters, police officers and other emergency workers.

The trip to Ohio marks Ridge's second public engagement outside of Washington since taking over the nascent Homeland Security department.

The previous trip was to Florida, another key state.

The Ad Council – the nonprofit group that came up with Smokey Bear's "Only you can prevent forest fires" and McGruff the crime dog's "Take a bite out of crime" – helped put together the campaign.

The ads don't seem to have a single catch phrase, although most of them include the words, "Be ready."

The campaign essentially is free to taxpayers, officials said.

It is starting under a $5 million donation from the nonprofit Sloan Foundation and will rely on tens of millions of dollars of donated ad space and airtime to get the message out.

One billboard will be going up in Times Square in New York City later this month.

The Martin Agency, an advertising firm in Richmond, Va., developed the multimedia campaign pro bono, according to Homeland Security officials.

to be done at a time when the team is searching for answers.

"These type of things are unexpected. It can happen at any given time," Hart said. "Everyone wants to win, and they say they want to win, but you never know what everyone is thinking. We found the problem. We didn't get the hustle starts. Now we have to find the solution."

K-State now is forced to win on the road if they hope to be considered for postseason play.

The Wildcats will return to action Saturday when they play Iowa State in Ames, Iowa.

History will be working against K-State, as the Cats haven't scored a road conference win since March 3, 2001.

"This is certainly a low point of the season," Wooldridge said. "We had a lot on the line tonight, and we didn't get it done. We game our home court away, and certainly, that's disappointing. But we have to find some vitality left in us and try and go win on the road."

VICTORY | Women respond to Tigers' runs, scoring threats

there was a couple times we didn't get back on defense and they got some transition points."

Twelve of the Tigers' first 13 points in the second half belonged to Missouri's two main scoring threats. Evan Unrau had nine of her 15 during the stretch, while Kerensa Barr's 3-pointer at the 18:05 mark was the next step in a team-high 17.

"They're two great players, and they were trying to keep their team in the game," Mahoney said.

K-State, however, had three players to answer the Tiger comeback bid.

A 7-2 Wildcat run, aided by layups from Mahoney, Wecker and Ohlde, restored the lead to 17 by the 10:33 mark.

"That was big for us to not get too rattled," Mahoney said. "The crowd was getting into it, they got a few calls and they were making their run.

Missouri's next run – a 17-4 spurt that ended at the 4:55 mark – would pull the Tigers to within four at 53-49, but K-State would answer the charge again and lead by as many as 11 in the final minutes.

"That's life in the Big 12," Patterson said. "If you let down your guard at all, they're coming after you."

LOSS | 2nd-half play sheds light on turnover, shooting challenges

Tim Ellis said. "We've been getting good looks. They just haven't been falling. We just have to go back and work on it. We just have to take our time and get better.

"We're capable of playing so much better than that. We didn't play very well at all tonight."

Wooldridge said three-point shooting was just one problem the Cats have to solve before facing Iowa State on Saturday.

"It was like a wildfire," he said. "It spread from one guy to the next. It wasn't just one person. The turnovers in the second half were another major obstacle that made a difference in the game."

present new problems.

The industrial park is 7 1/2 miles from campus, which could be a problem because most of the services are done for the university, Wilburn said.

The distance will require better customer service on campus to ensure Printing Service is meeting all the needs of its customers, he said.

Fairman said there is a possibility that Printing Services could have a location in the Union so customers will have an on-campus contact. He also said a delivery service is a possibility, but both of these options will be explored in more depth after the move.

Printing Services recently sold its newspaper printing press, which was used to print the Collegian until 1998. The press was purchased in 1965, and different parts were sold to newspapers in Marysville, Kan., and Nebraska, and another part was sold to a private business in Chile.

The press was outdated, and its use did not warrant the cost for maintenance, Wilburn said.

Total revenue from the sale was about $25,000, Wilburn said, and will be used to upgrade Printing Services' computers and networks.

Printing Services has been housed in Kedzie Hall since 1908.

"There are some anxieties," Fairman said.

"This is something new and different. There is some nervousness because they're entering uncharted water."

enrollment," he said. "Students are looking at an opportunity to go to school, stay in school and do things in terms of enhancing their curriculum."

The Manhattan campus spring enrollment is 19,773, compared to last year's 19,479.

The Salina campus, however, saw a decrease from 930 to this spring's 862.

Kristin Magette, coordinator of public and alumni relations for K-State-Salina, said the Salina decrease could be linked with the current military situation.

"Being a small campus, we are impacted by military deployment a little more so than a larger campus," she said. "We only have 1,100 students, so even if we were to lose five or 10 students, it is a big hit."

Magette said the economy is another impact.

"Really, we are looking at an economy that is weaker than a year ago," she said. "With the fields we specialize in, the job market isn't as good as it was. That tends to impact student enrollment."

"Students are looking at an opportunity to go to school, stay in school and do things in terms of enhancing their curriculum."

Monty Nielsen
UNIVERSITY REGISTRAR

Magette said the administration of K-State-Salina isn't too concerned about enrollment because their fall enrollment continues to go up.

The total increase in K-State's spring enrollment is something Nielsen said is in the university's interest.

"It is always positive when we see an increase, and this is no exception," Nielsen said.

passengers must go to the same residence. They have to go straight there – no Taco Bell stops," Burnett said.

The cab company charges Student Governing Association $1 per mile and will be notified if the bill reaches $900 for the month.

The bill is paid out of the student activity fund, Burnett said.

Kristin Magette, coordinator of public and alumni relations, said K-State-Salina is trying to get the word out on SafeRide.

"We are having key chains, posters and T-shirts made," she said. "We want to make sure it's well-advertised and that students are aware of it."

Burnett said she doesn't have exact numbers on how many people have used the program, but she said it is working out well.

"It's been smooth sailing so far," she said.

KDOT suffers budget crisis

Passed bill to cut $95 million from highways

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kansas Legislature is a day late and $95 million short – a debt that is leaving the Kansas Department of Transportation singing the blues.

The House and Senate passed a bill last week that will reduce the state's budget woes, but withhold $95 million from this year's state highway fund. Gov. Kathleen Sebelius is expected to sign the bill, withholding money that was to be repaid June 30 after the Legislature borrowed from the fund last session. Now, restored funds aren't expected until June 2005.

Marty Matthews, KDOT public information officer, said the department won't know the full effects of the cuts until the Legislature adjourns this spring.

"We won't know until May the size of the cuts," he said. "There will likely be more cuts to the highway program."

Cuts that may include an additional $157 million loss in sales tax revenue.

Matthews said loss of revenue won't decrease safety on KDOT's 9,600 miles of roadway. Instead the department may have to delay expansion projects or cut services in other areas.

Senate discusses march

Senators pass bill to fund Ordinary Women's rally

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An allocation bill to provide financial support to the fourth-annual Take Back the Night rally for the campus group Ordinary Women passed with a 38-8-6 vote at Thursday night's Student Senate meeting.

Before its approval, however, debate was given on the exact funding of the event.

The approved allocation will provide $1,705 to support the April 25 rally night's speaker Magdalen Hsu-Li, a professional music artist, painter, poet and speaker. Hsu-Li will be speaking on violence against women.

The debate among student senators revolved around the question of whether funding the rally would create a sense of support for the controversial women's rights march that precedes the event.

The march is only open to women and, in the past, has had included obscene language, Jeremy Stohs, senator, said.

Head Start faculty protest Bush's proposal

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A proposal by President Bush to shift control of Head Start, the preschool program for underprivileged children, from the federal government to states is being met with skepticism.

The proposal calls for the program, which serves nearly one million children, to be melded with existing state programs.

Administration officials have said this would allow states to coordinate Head Start better with preschool programs. Oversight of the program would also be moved from Health and Human Services to the federal Education Department.

Sally Frick, program director for Riley County Head Start, said she has many concerns about the proposal.

One of those is that the mission and

Five-year-old Macaiah Keys is one of more than a hundred area three- to five-year-olds that could be affected by President Bush's plans for Head Start.

focus of the program would be altered. Frick said Head Start currently addresses health, social and academic needs of the children involved.

"I'm afraid this type of system would focus entirely on academics and the other needs would get watered down," Frick said.

Those other needs – including vision and hearing screenings, nutrition and health – are just as important to a child's success in school as academic training, Frick said.

She said she is also concerned that current state budget situations might cause the program to be weakened or even eliminated.

"At least 40 of our states are in budget crises like they haven't seen for years. What's going to happen with those?" Frick said. "I don't want Head Start to be cut to try to save states money."

Sarah Green, president of the National Head Start Association, a nonprofit organization that supports Head Start, called Bush's proposal a potential

Freshman gets variety in workout, continues training

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Variety – the secret behind Cara Shufelberger's success.

Shufelberger, freshman in secondary education, has been working out and eating right for the past two weeks as part of the Wellness Resource Center's six-week Spring Break Training Program.

She keeps her workout routine interesting by lifting weights, running, playing intramural basketball and taking exercise classes to complete strength training and cardiovascular requirements.

"It just gets old if I do the same thing every day. I try to keep it interesting," she said. "I'm even trying water aerobics next week, so that should be fun."

Fitness Consultant Stephanie Caouette, senior in kinesiology, said variety is important while exercising.

"When you do the same continuous motion over and over again, the body adapts to it and won't continue to burn calories as well," Caouette said. "By adding variety, the amount of calories she burns will increase and keep her body interested."

Caouette advised Shufelberger to start doing lower-back exercises in addition to her abdominal exercises.

"I bumped her up this week," she said. "She was doing three days of ab workouts – now she's doing two abs and two lower back."

Shufelberger said she also will begin lifting free weights.

Variety is the secret behind Cara Shufelberger's success as she enters the third week of her Spring Break Training Program. Shufelberger has a Judo class on Thursday evenings at Ahearn Field House.

Getting fit

Follow freshman Cara Shufelberger for six weeks during her Spring Break Training Program at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

"I'm already lifting more weights, and my arms are really sore this week. I'm starting with free weights this week, too," she said. "I'm going to try them at home at first, instead of going out in the masses of people and embarrassing myself."

Caouette said Shufelberger is doing a great job of maintaining intensity within the time allotted to her workouts.

"I've noticed her attitude change from when she first started," Caouette said. "I can see she's doing it more for herself and she likes doing it."

Shufelberger said she enjoys her new lifestyle.

"I think I have a little more energy," she said. "I don't feel like my body has changed that much – I just feel better."

They are not happy, but they are certainly not surprised.

Officials at K-State-Salina said they were expecting some decrease in enrollment this semester because of the current military situation, but it is not something they are celebrating.

"The dean said he had students come to him and tell him they were not dropping out, but that they were not enrolling because they knew they would be called to service," said Kristin Magette, coordinator of public and alumni relations for K-State-Salina. "At this point, the lower numbers are unavoidable because of the current change in the military."

The Salina campus saw enrollment drop from 930 students in spring 2002 to 862 this spring, a 7.3-percent decrease.

"Being a small campus, we are going to be affected more from military deployment," Magette said. "If we lose a small amount of students, it is a big hit for us."

Magette said that since the school is training pilots, the military interest might be slightly higher for K-State-Salina students.

"The students involved in aviation might also have a particular interest in the military," Magette said. "The two seem to go hand in hand."

While the numbers are lower this semester, school officials are not overly concerned. The school's fall enrollment has been increasing steadily for the past five years. Also, Magette said, the overall enrollment has nearly doubled in 10 years – increasing from 674 students in 1990 to 1,099 students in fall 2002.

"We plan to continue to see growth,"

K-State students enjoy residence hall life

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lindsey Hunt didn't think living in the residence halls would be as fun as it turned out to be.

"We have a lot of fun," Hunt, freshman in business, said. "Sometimes you can't sleep, but it's a good time."

Hunt and floormates Amanda Ahrens and Kelsey Moncrief agreed they are living in the residence halls to meet people.

"I really wanted to meet people and get involved," Moncrief, freshman in political science, said.

The residence halls house about 3,500 students, said Derek Jackson, assistant director of housing for residence life.

He said the halls can hold about 3,800 students, which allows a little bit of breathing room, but not much.

"We are pretty full," Jackson said. "We haven't turned people away in the past couple of years, but we're tight."

Freshmen are not required to live on campus, but Moncrief said he thinks two years in the residence halls is a good idea.

"I will have two more years after that, so I think that's plenty of time to live outside the dorms," she said.

Diana Hyle, resident assistant in West Hall, said she has found people live in residence halls for the convenience.

"You can't find anything closer, and it's just as cheap or cheaper than an apartment or house," she said.

Hyle, junior in English, plans on living in the residence halls for another year not only because she's a resident assistant, but because of the community.

"It is just good to have a community right there," she said. "There is always someone to eat dinner with."

Jackson said the average student lives in the halls for one year, and about 65 percent of first-year students move off campus.

Ahrens, sophomore in agriculture business, said that when it's time to move off campus, she believes it won't be too hard to find a place.

"There are lots of apartments you can find," she said.

"As older people move out, those places will be available."

On campus or off, the living options at K-state provide important choices for students.

"It's been a long-standing tradition at K-State to give students choices," Jackson said. "It's one of the things that gives K-State its value – to give its students choices."

Campuses experience housing problems

By Bekah McCurdy
THE LANTERN (OKLAHOMA STATE UNIVERSITY)

COLUMBUS, Ohio – Sharing a bathroom, not having carpet and being confined in close quarters with someone you have never met – the horrors of residence hall living are something most freshmen only dream of escaping.

Good thing they chose to go to Ohio State University.

At schools like the University of Maryland and Boston College, undergraduates typically live in residence halls the entire time they attend school, largely because of a lack of off-campus housing.

OSU requires freshmen to live in the residence halls for their first academic year on main campus.

"Students are encouraged to live on campus for reasons of safety, staffing and proximity," said Toni Greensdale, associate director of Residence Life at OSU.

Older students have the choice of living in residence halls or off campus, and the area surrounding campus offers many options.

The University of Maryland and Boston College have different perspectives on student housing.

"We're two miles from D.C., and there is not affordable off-campus housing," said Scott Young, spokesman for the University of Maryland.

The University of Maryland has seen an increase in the number of undergraduates attending, and its residence hall shortage is attributed to an increase in students.

Without the available and affordable off-campus housing, students at the university normally live in residence halls for their entire undergraduate career.

OSU has yet to be faced with on-campus housing issues like those of Boston College and University of Maryland.

"If there is a need for more campus accommodations, universities are going to have to look into specialized housing, like apartment complexes," Greensdale said.

Osborn, Quackenbush plan to focus on 4 platform goals for campaign

Pair's plans include lobbying group, university safety board, increased online services

Tammy Jo Osborn

Julie Quackenbush

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Communication is key.

At least when it comes to student government, said Tammy Jo Osborn and Julie Quackenbush, candidates for student body president and vice president.

Osborn, senior in political science and pre-medicine, said the pair will implement programs, if elected, that will facilitate communication and ensure K-State's future success.

"We're bringing a new twist to government issues," she said. "Each platform issue inherently has a communication value to it."

Osborn and Quackenbush will focus on four main issues.

Quackenbush, junior in industrial engineering, said the pair's first goal is to implement a campuswide student-lobbying group, called PULSE, that will address students' concerns and give students a better idea of where their money is being spent.

"PULSE will increase communication between student voices and elected officials," she said. "It's a way for students to rally around a common call."

Osborn said the pair has already begun recruiting members for PULSE, a group she said will teach students when and how to contact government officials in K-State administration, and state, local and national governments.

"It's a training-activism group – it's making the voice of K-State students heard at the right place at the right time," she said. "We'll keep our hand on the pulse of the student body and respond to those needs.

"The biggest thing about a democracy is that people have to know what's going on in order to participate, and a lot of times you'll see that that doesn't happen – that's what this group seeks to do," Osborn said.

"And that's not happening right now at K-State," Quackenbush said. "Students don't know what's going on in Senate."

Quackenbush said the pair won't focus on issues that are already being addressed in Senate, such as wait lists, advising and Dead Week.

"Progress is already being made on these issues. It's just taking a little time," she said. "Things are being done, so we can look at programs in expansion to that."

Primary Elections

This is the fifth in a five-day series profiling, in alphabetical order, the platforms of the candidates running for student body president and vice president.

Primary elections will be Feb. 25 and 26.

Programs like the pair's proposed United University Safety Board, or UUSB.

"UUSB will basically be a collaborative effort to address safety on campus concerns before they occur – to seek out safety problems, to be proactive, look for problems and to address them and provide solutions," Quackenbush said.

The pair also hopes to increase online services through a Student Involvement Portfolio.

"It will basically be an online portfolio that graphically illustrates all the training you've received through different organizations or positions," Osborn said. "It's an illustration of who you are as an individual."

Osborn said the online service will be an expansion of the current online résumé offered through Career and Employment Services, facilitating mentorship relationships between students, helping students get jobs, and keeping alumni connected.

That connection to campus is also part of their fourth issue, a new Wildcat Weekend.

Osborn said they hope to improve the one-day orientation program by eventually adopting a format similar to Texas A&M's three-day, off-campus orientation camp.

She said it will help freshmen and transfer students get involved from day one.

The pair said one issue isn't more important than others, however.

"We've been getting a lot of feedback from students, and the issues are important across the board," Osborn said.

"We believe in John Maxwell's quote, 'People support what they help create.'"

K-State's annual rodeo event begins tonight

3-day event expected to draw spectators, contestants interested in competitions

By Wendy Lynn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The American West will come to life this weekend at Weber Arena during the annual K-State Rodeo, which will bring more than 500 contestants and thousands of spectators to campus.

"I plan on attending the rodeo this weekend. It's exciting to watch the competition," said Suzanne Pacha, senior in agricultural journalism and communications.

K-State students will be participating against other contestants from 23 schools in Kansas, Oklahoma and Missouri. A variety of events will take place, such as bareback and saddle bronco riding, roping, steer wrestling, barrel racing and bull riding.

"It's extremely thrilling, fast-paced action," David McClure, rodeo coach and manager said. "We pack a lot into two hours. It's really a good time and something people don't get to see every day."

Rodeo goers will have the opportunity to see some of the top contestants and rough stock in the nation. K-State is a member of the Central Plains region, which produces the most college national champions each year.

Only the best stock is chosen for this event. This combination should make for an interesting afternoon or evening of entertainment, McClure said.

"Rodeo is more exciting than any other sporting event. It's different every time," he said.

Eight K-State students will participate in the rodeo. Most of them have also competed on the high school rodeo circuit.

College rodeo is the next step of competition that leads to a professional career in rodeo. The team members travel to 10 rodeos during the school year. There are also regional and national competitions if the members qualify.

Planning for this year's rodeo started last April. For the past several months, students have been working 30 to 40 hours a week in preparation. The team also coordinates a children's rodeo and a rodeo for the disabled as community service projects.

"It's a team effort to put the rodeo on with a lot of planning," said Autumn Kleiner, junior in accounting and current rodeo queen.

Those interested in watching the rodeo have four chances to attend during the weekend. They can come more than once since rodeo's never the same, McClure said.

"We are a part of the western culture," he said. "Come out and see what rodeo is all about."

Rodeo

The K-State Rodeo will be this weekend at Weber Arena. Tickets are $6 in advance and $7 at the door. Children's tickets are $3 in advance and $3.50 at the door. Tickets may be purchased at SBJ Western Wear, RB Outpost, the K-State Student Union Bookstore or Orchelins in Manhattan.

Events include:

TO THE POINT

New Head Start plan should not change focus

President Bush's proposal to shift control of the Head Start programs across the nation needs to have careful consideration before any action takes place.

With the potential shift, the program's oversight will move from Health and Human Services to the federal Education Department. If this shift happens, the program's focus should not change.

Head Start provides health care and education to millions of underprivileged children across the nation. However, many Head Start officials fear the change in oversight will result in a change of focus.

Officials for the federal Education Department still need to focus on education, but not eliminate health care services, such as hearing and vision screenings, provided to these children.

Health is vital to the learning process, and the federal Education Department must remember this if they take over Head Start's services.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

If I was "Joe Millionaire," I probably would have picked the girl that was in the freaky fetish video.

Micah Hawkinson is such a freaking tool.

I hate to break it to all the new arrivals at the Rec, but you're already in the shape you're going to be for spring break — round.

Micah Hawkinson: stop following me.

Is it normal for the Fourum to be calling me back?

What does President Wefald think as "serious" cheating?

War has never solved anything, except for slavery, fascism, Nazism and communism.

How come men seemed to be turned off by an intelligent, pretty, black female ... who has a kid?

My roommate informed me that today she washes her butt crack with her hand.

If you think I'm sexy, and you want my body, come on, baby. Let me know.

Harry Potter is my hero.

Hey, who wants to go to war with Russia again? I'm sick of these dang terrorists.

My Cabbage Patch doll doesn't have any nipples.

So I broke my best friend's Chia Pet. I promise I will glue it back together, and it will look like nothing ever happened.

Girls suck because they never return calls. Never.

"Howard the Duck" is by far George Lucas's best movie.

Sex: just add latex.

So my mom took away my KY jelly. What did she do with it?

I get nervous every time I call the Fourum.

Can someone please tell me why Mike Clark still has a job at K-State?

My roommate has a broken foot. Is it wrong for me to have him walk to class?

All right. I get it. I have a big nose.

God created me proportional.

Night of hip-hop tears down racial lines

MATTHEW WEBBER

I recently attended a concert at which three facts were made crystal clear:

1) The Roots are one of the tightest bands I have ever seen live.

2) White people love hip-hop music.

3) Anti-rap prejudice stains the mainstream media.

I, a paleface rap fan, was blown away by the Roots' performance, which attracted as many Caucasians as African-Americans. Unlike in the U.S. Senate or on Texas' death row, the white-to-black ratio of Roots' fans seemed proportional to America's racial makeup.

While true racial equality might still be a liberal's dream, Martin Luther King Jr.'s dreams are realized whenever groups like the Roots or Jurassic 5 perform concerts. White and black boys and girls dance to the same drumbeats, shout the same lyrics and pump their fists with the same emotions.

When I attend a Roots show, I feel like I'm a part of a brotherhood of men rather than a brotherhood of hotel-trashing and groupie-banging manliness. If I scream at one of these concerts, it's because the music has overwhelmed me, not because I've been exhorted to by some surly, cocaine-fueled idol.

There's no, "F– you, St. Louis," or "You, in the front row, show me your tits." There's passion, meaning and a groove that moves. There's masterful musicianship that knows no race.

There's more positivity than in a year of the Fox News Channel.

When Pepsi planned to air a commercial last year featuring the rapper Ludacris, Bill O'Reilly of Fox News' "The O'Reilly Factor" criticized the company for employing such an allegedly profane and misogynistic spokesman. The ensuing uproar among conservative groups convinced Pepsi not to air the commercial.

When Pepsi featured the Osbournes in one of its Super Bowl spots, O'Reilly and other cultural conservatives were silent – as silent as a radio edit of an Ozzy Osbourne quote.

Although Ozzy is internationally infamous for his potty mouth – as well as for his biting the heads off doves and bats and possibly inspiring one teenager's "Suicide Solution" – O'Reilly seemed OK with his peddling Pepsi.

Ludacris, however, has a song titled "Move Bitch." Apparently, this makes him scarier than the self-proclaimed Prince of Darkness to certain members of the news media, perhaps the same journalists who tried to link Jam Master Jay's murder to the previous murders of Tupac and the Notorious B.I.G., just because all three happened to have released rap records.

Ludacris curses. He performs music that people younger than O'Reilly listen to. He's an eloquent black man expressing his opinions.

To some, this makes Ludacris terrifying.

Russell Simmons of the Hip Hop Summit Action Network was quick to point out Pepsi's and O'Reilly's hypocrisies. He wasn't criticizing Ozzy. He was critiquing a media double standard that valorizes a vulgar rocker and villainizes a vernacular rapper – who happens to be black.

Meanwhile, the Roots were touring the country, selling out clubs, playing for anybody with an open mind.

Not that you'd hear about it in the news.

The best hip-hop music expresses what rock music hasn't in years: aggression, yes, and anti-authoritarianism; but also community, education, respect.

The Roots aren't merely the best rap band. They're one of the most adept bands in any genre.

Their lyrics are insightful – their performances inspiring.

I love this music, and so did the other whites dancing around me.

Had O'Reilly been there, he couldn't have censored this fact.

At least for one night, whites and blacks were united.

Perhaps not coincidentally, Coca-Cola was served at the venue.

New restaurants needed to help small-town atmosphere

ANDREW LAWSON

One sad truth about Manhattan is that there isn't much to do.

I usually love Manhattan's quiet, small-town atmosphere. There are times, though, when I wish it was more like a real college town.

You know, kind of like Lawrence, without all the Birkenstock-wearing hippies.

Nowhere is this deficiency more apparent than in food joints. For people like me, food isn't just sustenance – it's a hobby.

Manhattan's restaurant dilemma is a lack of choices. What options are this city lacking?

Fast food

The Little Apple has this covered. Hardee's had a prime location in Aggieville, and it went out of business. This indicates that the market, like the greasy food, is actually oversaturated.

The single best fast food place, though, is still missing. Spangles gives you high-quality food and is the best bang for your buck. "It just tastes better."

Nice, generic sit-down chains

After the Wildcats wipe the turf with their opponents, only luck will get you a seat within three hours at one of the four major restaurants – Amarillo Grill, Applebee's, Carlos O'Kelly's and Chili's.

Cracker Barrel, one of the best places in this area, is all the way over in Junction City.

There simply needs to be more of these places. Some ideas include Bennigan's, Black-Eyed Pea, Old Chicago, Outback Steakhouse, Spear's and T.G.I. Friday's.

And what's a college town without a Hooters? (Hey, I go there for the food.)

Ethnic food

The coolest place I have eaten at is an authentic Persian restaurant in Milwaukee. The second-coolest is a Japanese place in Wichita called Osaka where the chefs cook in front of you on smokeless hibachis.

It's a crying shame Manhattan's ethnic diversity isn't reflected in its food scene.

This isn't to say the few places we have aren't excellent. El Cazador is one of the finest Mexican restaurants at which I have dined.

There are just so many more places we could be sampling on a regular basis, including French, German, Greek, Italian and Mediterranean cuisine.

By the way, there's more to Asian food than just take-out Chinese – Indian, Korean, Lebanese, Thai and Vietnamese, for instance.

These could either be family-owned businesses or franchises. Even an Olive Garden would be an improvement.

Breakfast

This deserves its own category. When Village Inn, with its lousy service and average food, is the only obvious place to take your family in the morning, you have a problem.

Thanks for nothing, Country Kitchen. Can we please get an IHOP in here, pronto?

Seafood

Um, Long John Silver's, anybody?

Yeah, that's what I thought. Red Lobster, please save us.

Diners

Bob's doesn't count. That's a trucker diner (which I sometimes happen to like, if you're wondering).

I mean imitation 1960s diners, like Jimmie's or Walt's in Wichita. Not only do they have excellent food, but their replicated atmosphere is a nice alternative to the standard modern restaurant.

Hidden gems

After all this bitching, I feel obligated to recognize four wonderful Manhattan businesses that continue to excel in a food desert.

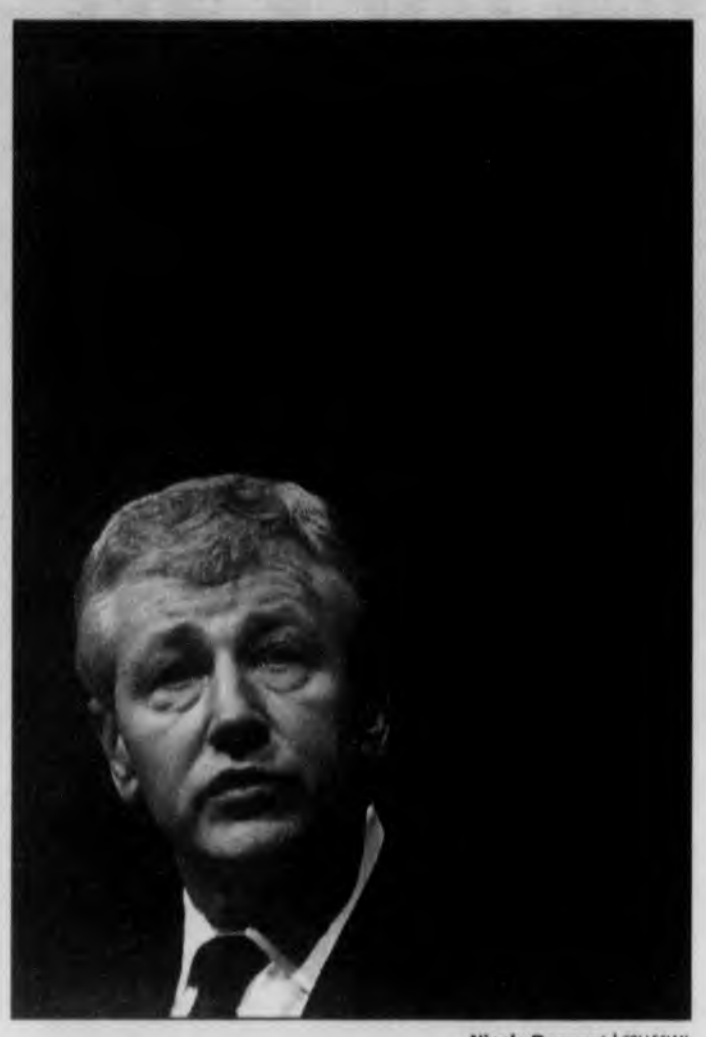
4. Kreem Kup is the ultimate greasy spoon. Yes, you can hear your arteries clog as you eat, but it's in the most happy way.

3. Lurking behind Texas Star Cafe is the superb Hibachi Hut, which actually puts the "grill" in "bar and grill."

2. Near Dillons in Westloop, Little Apple Brewing Co. is the ultimate microbrewery and eatery. Wear something insured against smoke damage, though.

1. Early Edition is possibly the best kept secret in Manhattan. Though half as large as Village Inn, they seem to always find a way to seat and serve you in record fashion. Located north of CiCo Park, this is without a doubt the greatest breakfast/brunch/lunch establishment in Manhattan.

I hope more options will continue to open in Manhattan. Whiskey Creek Steakhouse is a good start.



Until this happens, I have the same limited choices. When I want something different, I'll probably have to go to Topeka, Wichita or Kansas City.

Senator says U.S. needs alliances against Iraq

Hagel: citizens have to change image in time of potential war

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN
U.S. Senator Chuck Hagel, R-Neb., speaks at the podium in McCain Auditorium Thursday during this year's first Landon Lecture.

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

America bears a heavy burden for securing a better tomorrow, Sen. Chuck Hagel said.

Hagel, R-Neb., delivered K-State's first Landon Lecture of the year Thursday morning at McCain Auditorium.

"The complexities of an interconnected world give us little margin for error," Hagel said of America's actions.

"A calibration one way or the other could bring tremendous disaster."

The senator said war with Iraq would definitely bring change, but the nature of that change is unforeseeable.

"We can't plan the future of mankind on hope. We would have to be in Iraq for a long time," he said.

The senator spoke of the different issues the United States faces with Iraq, Korea, Russia and other nations. He said that in dealing with global issues, the United States needs to build and sustain global alliances.

"Security at home can't be separated from dangers abroad. We surely learned that in this country on Sept. 11, 2001," he said.

Hagel said victory will require extensive cooperation and a seamless network because the United States cannot defeat terrorism on its own.

He said he supports President Bush and war with Iraq, but Americans need to change how the rest of the world views the United States.

"America will require a wider-lens view of how the world sees us. At this critical time, our policies and rhetoric should not create distance between America and her allies."

As a nation, the United States should listen and learn and then forge a coalition based on common interests, Hagel said, because Iraq is a threat to the whole world – not just the United States.

"Today, America stands alone in proclaiming the urgency of force on Iraq," he said. "America must balance its determination with patience."

Hagel said that if war with Iraq is necessary, it should be a means – not an end – to getting Saddam Hussein out of power.

"The road to peace in the Middle East does not end in Baghdad," he said.

The United States will need to remain in Iraq, he said, because a regime change will require a long-term commitment.

Hagel said he thinks America should create partnerships with people of the Arabic world to encourage democratic reform.

"The government has opposed governmental and societal reform for so long," he said.

> "Today, America stands alone in proclaiming the urgency of force on Iraq," he said. "America must balance its determination with patience."
> Sen. Chuck Hagel
> R-NEBRASKA

Although Hagel is aware of the threat Iraq and Saddam pose to the world, he said he does not feel Iraq is an immediate threat.

"For 12 years, we've had him bottled up. He's still alive, but we're dealing with him."

Hagel said Korea poses the most urgent threat to the United States' security.

"They're all interconnected, though. You can't pick and choose," he said.

That is why America must have allies, he said.

"Great powers have limitations," Hagel said.

Heidi Heinrichs, junior in family life and human services, said she was impressed by the senator's emphasis on the United States forming alliances rather than trying to do it all alone.

"I was impressed with his proposal to slow down and make sure we're thinking this through. He is making sure we think about the consequences of the removal of Saddam," she said.

Hagel said he was grateful for the opportunity to speak because he considers students to be key players in the future of the United States.

"Without student government and student leadership, our country would not work nearly as well as it does," he said.

Florida professor, 7 others charged with supporting terrorists' efforts

By Curt Anderson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON – A Florida computer engineering professor and seven other men were charged Thursday with overseeing and financing the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group, which has been blamed for killing more than 100 people in Israel and adjacent territories.

The University of South Florida professor, 45-year-old Sami Amin Al-Arian, and three other U.S. residents were arrested after the 50-count indictment was returned by a federal grand jury in Tampa, Fla. The indictment describes Al-Arian as the Islamic Jihad's U.S. leader, head of a terrorist cell in Tampa and secretary of the group's worldwide council.

Attorney General John Ashcroft said the indictment sends a message: "We will hunt down the suppliers of terrorist money, we will shut down their sources and we will ensure that both terrorists and their financiers meet the same swift, certain justice of the United States of America."

Shortly after his arrest in Tampa, Al-Arian told reporters, "It's all about politics." On forced leave from the university, he has publicly rejected the idea that he has ties to terrorism.

His attorney, Nicholas Matassini, said after a preliminary court hearing, "He's a political prisoner right now as we speak." The attorney denounced the indictment as "a work of fiction."

The indictment accuses the eight men of operating a criminal racketeering enterprise since 1984 supporting Palestinian Islamic Jihad and with conspiracy to kill and maim people abroad, conspiracy to provide material support to the group, extortion, visa fraud, perjury and other charges. Each defendant could face life in prison if convicted.

Al-Arian and two others were arrested in Tampa and a fourth man was arrested in Chicago. The other four are leaders of the group who live abroad and are being sought, Ashcroft said.

Palestinian Islamic Jihad was founded in the late 1970s, and its roots go back to the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt that also spawned the Hamas terrorist group. Its goals, according to the indictment, are to destroy Israel and end Western influence in the Middle East.

The group's alleged killings have included suicide bombings, car bombings and drive-by shootings, including a June 5, 2002, suicide attack in Haifa, Israel, that killed 20 and injured 50.

Among the people whose deaths are blamed on the organization are two U.S. citizens: Alisa Flatow, 20, and Shoshana Ben-Yishai, 16.

Alisa Flatow, then a junior at Brandeis University, died in a 1995 bus bombing in the Gaza Strip. Her father, Stephen Flatow of West Orange, N.J., said Thursday, "This demonstrates the old saw about the wheels of justice – they grind slow, but they grind exceedingly fine."

The indictment describes numerous intercepted telephone calls and faxes in which those charged are said to have discussed Islamic Jihad bombings and other attacks, financial problems and whether to ally more closely with terror groups Hezbollah and Hamas. There is no mention of al-Qaeda.

The men frequently talk in apparent code, substituting words like "magazine" and "shirt" for thousands of dollars they were allegedly funneling to Islamic Jihad.

To date, Ashcroft said, the Justice Department has investigated 70 terrorist financing or support organizations, winning 23 convictions and freezing $113 million in assets of 62 organizations.

The Islamic Jihad fund-raising and other alleged activities were centered on two organizations in Tampa: the Islamic Committee for Palestine – originally called Islamic Concern Project Inc. – and the World and Islamic Studies Enterprise, or WISE, according to the indictment.

Most of those charged also had some connection to the University of South Florida at one time or another.

Besides Al-Arian, those arrested were:

–Sameeh Hammoudeh, 42, born in the West Bank, now a resident of Temple Terrace, Fla.

–Hatim Naji Fariz, 30, born in Puerto Rico and now living in Spring Hill, Fla.

–Ghassan Zayed Ballut, 41, a West Bank native now living in Tinley Park, Ill.

Those living abroad were:

–Ramadan Abdullah Shallah, 45.

–Bashir Musa Mohammed Nafi, 50.

–Mohammed Tasir Hassan Al-Khatib, 46.

–Abd AL Aziz Awda, 52.

Boxing needs new Tyson

JOEL REICHENBERGER

What is boxing?

Nothing like it used to be, that's for sure.

Boxing is a spectacle, and today there is only one fighter capable of putting on an adequate show.

Mike Tyson.

Tyson is the only hard-hitting, flamboyantly bizarre guy I want to see anymore.

But it wasn't always that way. Boxing was built by hammering, gutsy show-boaters not so different than Tyson.

My Death and Dying in History professor walked into class Monday and set a picture on the projector.

He pointed out two boxers, one with his arm thrust into the air by a referee.

"Who is this?" he asked, directing us to the victorious party.

No one answered. Ever the smart-aleck, I drew a laugh by pointing out that the referee looked like Anthony Hopkins' Hannibal Lecter.

"Rocky Marciano – the greatest fighter who ever lived," he said.

Marciano never lost. He is the only boxing champion to have ever retired undefeated.

In his greatest fight, Marciano was losing badly in the 12th round, but threw a quick right and knocked "Jersey Joe" Walcott to the ground.

Marciano fought with guts and a steel right arm.

But, that was then.

Today, only Tyson's graveyard spiral and race against Michael Jackson to insanity draw any attention.

Without the flashy show-boating champion of the past, boxing is doomed.

For the last 15 years, boxing has been missing that champion.

No doubt that throughout the 1990s there were many good fighters. Evander Holyfield and Lennox Lewis rose to be champions while Tyson wasted away in the slammer. But neither has shown the character of the boxing greats.

Muhammad Ali had character. A rhyming, show-boating, hot-headed man who backed up his words with incredible boxing – people loved Ali. He even retained his popularity after committing a blacklistable offense by ignoring the draft in 1967.

He was unpredictable and one of the greatest showmen ever.

Sugar Ray Robinson, another vying for the title of best ever, showed many of the same characteristics. He pioneered the ridiculous entourages that now accompany boxing's bad boys.

Fighting in the middleweight class in the 1950s, Robinson brought along a barber, a masseuse, a voice coach and even a midget for a mascot.

Boxing is about the spectacle. When someone like Marciano, Robinson, Ali or the first edition of Tyson can back that spectacle with a great fight, all the better.

But the spectacle has to come first.

That's why Lennox Lewis will never find any love in America. I don't to want to watch that British ponytail wag around my television for $50. I want to see a guy get his skull crushed by a rising uppercut, not the long, boring death-by-jab that Lewis dishes out.

I want to see people that hate each other. I want to see someone get really mad in a press conference or a one-round match followed by taunting and screaming.

Streak on line for Cats

Wildcat tennis looks to expand on recent wins

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 58 tennis team will put its four-match winning streak on the line tomorrow when it travels to Oxford, Miss., to face No. 40 Mississippi (2-5) at noon.

K-State (4-0) will look to continue its hot streak after Saturday's 7-0 dismantling of Utah. It was the second consecutive shutout for the Cats after beating Wichita State 7-0 the previous week.

Coach Steve Bietau said the victory over Utah was a critical one.

"I thought it was a really decisive win for our team," Bietau said.

Mississippi, coming off a tough weekend in which they lost to a pair of top-25 opponents, will try to rebound against the Cats. The Rebels fell to No. 19 South Alabama 4-3 on Friday and lost to No. 17 Fresno State 4-2 on Saturday.

Bietau said he isn't looking past the Rebels' record, though, and is preparing his

K-State will open the tournament against Illinois at 10 a.m. today. They follow up with games against Memphis on Saturday and the Air Force Academy on Sunday.

New pitchers 3-0 heading to Tennessee

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There was one concern for K-State last weekend before playing Western Illinois – the pitching staff.

Coach Mike Clark found 12 new pitchers on his staff this spring, eight from junior college and four from high school.

The Cats (3-0) head to Millington, Tenn., for the Service Academy Classic this weekend. All three K-State wins belong to newcomers Jared Bunn, Brett Bagley and Jim Ripley.

"I'm really happy," Clark said. "The big question mark was our pitching, and I thought our pitching was very, very good. We got ahead in the count for the most part. We were able to get our second and third pitches in the zone.

"I was very happy with our pitchers," he said. "Now the challenge is to go out and do it the second time and then do it the third time and show the consistency you have to have in order to pitch in this league."

Ripley (1-0) got the start against Creighton on Tuesday and earned praise from Clark. The junior college transfer tossed five innings in his debut and allowed one run on four hits while striking out four.

Clark said Ripley is close to the Cats No. 1 starter, but he still has a few things to work on.

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There's no time to sulk and no time to dwell on the past.

That's just how the Big 12 season works.

K-State dropped a home game to Baylor on Wednesday night, but the Cats now turn around and play at Iowa State tomorrow in Ames.

Junior Jarrett Hart said they'll find out right away if the Wildcats can rebound after the crushing loss to the Bears.

"We're going through one of those times and it's a test of our character," Hart said. "We've been tested all year long, and we've come up. We can come up around this."

If K-State hopes to bounce back and get a win on the road, it will need to shoot better from three-point range.

The Wildcats are 11-of-52 from behind the arc in their last three games.

Guard Gilson DeJesus, K-State's leading long-range shooter at 47 percent, has made just 25 percent of his attempts during that stretch.

Guard Tim Ellis said it isn't a matter of defenses shutting the Wildcat shooters down but a matter of simply hitting the open looks they get.

"We're just not knocking it down," Ellis said.

"We're getting good looks, they're just not falling. We just need to take our time and shoot it a little better or go to something else that works."

K-State (12-12, 3-8) at Iowa State (12-10, 2-9)
When: 12:45 p.m., Saturday
Where: Hilton Coliseum (14,092)

What has been working is the duo of Frank Richards and Matt Siebrandt.

Each is averaging 14 points during the last three games.

Richards said he is confident the Wildcats can rebound from games they should have won.

"We've shown that we have," he said. "I know we can. We're down, but we can't stay down."

Of K-State's last three road losses – Missouri, Oklahoma State and Texas A&M – one theme is present. At halftime, the Wildcats were down no more than four points.

Hart said K-State has come too close too many times and should have a number of wins on the road this season. It's a matter of believing they can do it, he said.

"It's all about confidence,"

College Basketball | Simien questionable

Wayne Simien, who had a double-double against Colorado on Wednesday night despite playing just 20 minutes in extreme pain, may not be ready Sunday when No. 6 Kansas meets No. 5 Oklahoma.

"I'm not going to be making that decision today and I might not even make that decision tomorrow," Kansas coach Roy Williams said. "It may be Saturday before I even think about, 'Well, can he go?'

Basketball | Koehn honored for academics

Sophomore Laurie Koehn became the third Wildcat ever to earn Verizon Academic All-District honors Thursday.

The only sophomore on the team, Koehn has a 3.95 cumulative GPA in secondary education.

The announcement makes Koehn, who has sat out K-State's last six contests due to a lingering ankle injury, a finalist for the Verizon Academic All-America Teams, to be announced March 7.

Junior center Nicole Ohlde, who was named to last season's first-team, and sophomore forward Kendra Wecker earned second-team honors.

Gayla Williams was the first Wildcat to earn academic honors in 1984.

Ramones tribute brings together U2, Manson for solid re-creations

"WE'RE A HAPPY FAMILY: RAMONES TRIBUTE"

★ ★ ★ ★ ☆

Album review by JJ Duncan

Sometimes cats are born with two heads. Sometimes mothers lift cars off children out of sheer adrenaline and determination. And sometimes tribute albums don't suck.

"We're a Happy Family" is the case in point.

Why is that? It's because this isn't just an assortment of artists that executives want to push on unwitting Ramones fans to give their up-and-comers recognition while cashing in on a recognizable name. This is a collection of artists, from the huge (U2 and Kiss) to the small (Pete Yorn and Rooney) who were truly changed in some way by the energy of a gangly, awkward singer and three chords in 4/4 time.

Of course, it helps that only one track is more than four minutes long.

The result is a collection of songs that often faithfully recapture the Ramones' reckless and energetic approach to music while re-tooling the sound according to each artist.

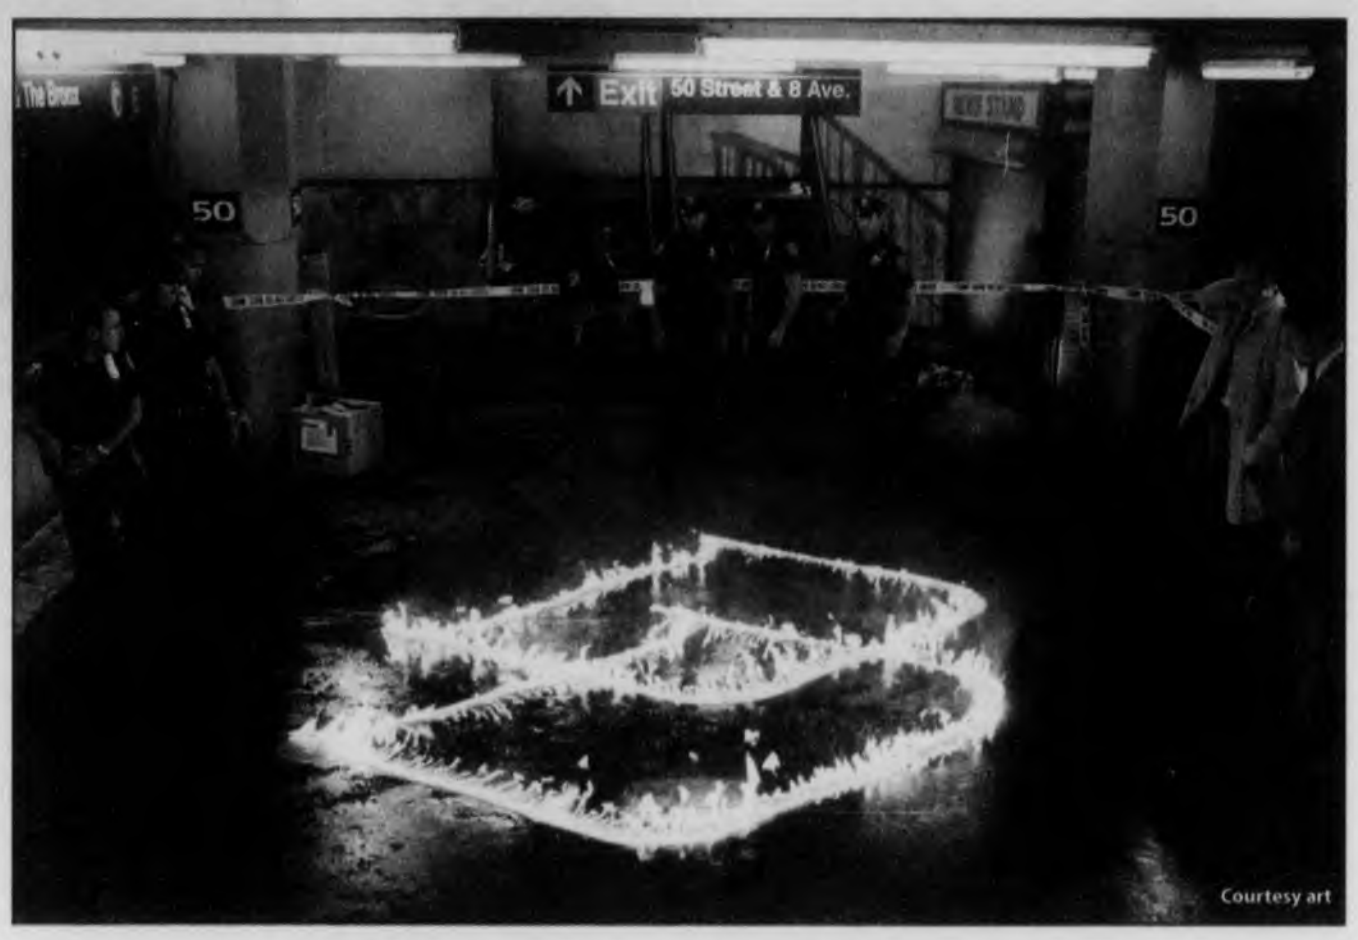
That's what happens when you get real, established artists to do a tribute. The songs aren't cheap Ramones re-creations. Each track has been taken in, ingested and repackaged in the style of the performer.

Just think about what that means when you look at the track list. Tom Waits is on there. The Pretenders are on there.

Even Marilyn Manson's dark, keyboard-laden "The KKK Took My Baby Away" sounds interesting given the context of the album.

One, two, three, four.

Thankfully, Ramones' guitarist Johnny Ramone retained almost total control over the production of the album in collaboration with Rob Zombie. That means the album was handled by a band member and hardcore Ramones fan. And they pulled out all the stops.



They kept punk credibility with Rancid's quick run of "Sheena is a Punk Rocker," and tracks by Green Day and the Offspring. They kept old-school credibility with the voodoo wail of Tom Waits, and the low-key performance of the Pretenders, though it would have been great to hear something from the likes of Elvis Costello or the Talking Heads.

Then, Ramone and Zombie show the influence of the Ramones on contemporary popular music with U2's faithful "Beat on the Brat" and the Red Hot Chili Peppers' defiant "Havana Affair."

The album isn't just 17 tracks of true rock music. It's a curator's argument for the importance of the Ramones to popular culture.

Will I listen to this album as often as I pop in a true Ramones record? Probably not. If you want the Ramones, nothing else will do.

Does the record justify the importance that musicians, fans and critics place on those misfits in black leather jackets who established "Rock 'n' Roll High School," attacked Reagan's foreign policies and taught a generation of music-lovers what rock music was all about? Definitely.

DARINGLY DULL

'Daredevil' needs its own hero, lacks character development

"DAREDEVIL"

★ ★ ☆ ☆ ☆

Movie review by Wendy Gorman

Judging by what I had seen in the previews, I sincerely believed the only thing "Daredevil" could possibly have going for it was its two beautiful stars.

That assessment was pretty close to the truth.

Not even Ben Affleck, as superhero extraordinaire, could save this movie.

Throughout the film, it remains a mystery why he (or Michael Clarke Duncan, for that matter) chose to be a part of this film.

The movie is based on the Marvel comic book. It tells the story of Matthew Murdock, who, in a freak accident, gets doused with some mysterious chemical labeled "biohazard." Matt is left blind, but with his other four senses sharpened and a radar gift that lets him see objects in a pulsating blue light.

After Matt's father, a boxer, is killed by some bad guys because he refused to throw a fight, Matt vows to bring sinners to justice and avenge his father's death. He eventually becomes a lawyer who only defends the innocent.

By night, Matt runs around in a funky maroon leather suit with itty-bitty ears on top, beating up on the scum of New York City. The press dub him "Daredevil."

The rest of the story seems to have no real rhyme or reason. The skimpy plot is just a vehicle for the action scenes.

Jennifer Garner ("Alias") gets to show off her martial arts skills as Elektra Natchios, Matt's love interest. Duncan ("The Green Mile") plays Kingpin, a crime boss whose actual transgressions are never revealed to the audience, and Colin Farrell ("Minority Report") portrays a truly despicable hitman, Bullseye. Bullseye has phenomenal aim and likes to kill innocent people for no reason.

There are several aspects of the movie that are disappointing. The dialogue is groan-inducing, Affleck's costume isn't really cool, the characters are essentially undeveloped and several plot points are left dangling in the air.

Characters that might become interesting, such as a clever newspaper reporter, Matt's law partner and a priest, are introduced only briefly before being tossed aside.

Though the writers apparently tried to inject some humor into the story, the end result still came off as a little too dark.

The most charitable things to be said about "Daredevil" are that the fight scenes and special effects are decent, and Matt and Elektra have one or two touching scenes where Affleck gets to showcase his signature charm.

For the most part, however, the movie is cheesy and boring. Maybe "Daredevil" was a decent comic book, but the movie leaves much to be desired.

GZA's album dilutes credibility of group's name

"LEGEND OF THE LIQUID SWORD"

★ ★ ★ ☆ ☆

Album review by Matthew Webber

There are some stories that have been told so often they have become legends: King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table, Ali Baba and the 40 Thieves and a Wu-Tang Clansman's "Legend of the Liquid Sword."

Since the Wu-Tang Clan's auspicious debut, "Enter the Wu-Tang," GZA (a.k.a. Genius) and his Clansmen have spun tales of Shaolin monks, swordplay and wordplay as frequently as virginal boys in high school gym classes tell fables of X-rated exploits.

Like a young boy's basepath narratives, many Wu-Tang songs sound like something you've heard before – usually because you have.

When multiple Wu-Tang members release watered-down albums each year, they dilute the credibility of their once-proud brand name.

Whereas a Wu-Tang production used to signify thesaurus-citing flows and apocalyptic soundscapes, some recent Wu-Tang offerings have sounded as revolutionary as Jordache jeans.

GZA, perhaps the Wu's most underrated member, has hearkened back to his Clan's halcyon days with his newest album, "Legend of the Liquid Sword," which is a sequel to his classic solo debut, "Liquid Swords."

Like all the best solo Wu-Tang albums (Method Man's "Tical," Ghostface Killah's "Supreme Clientele," Ol' Dirty Bastard's "Return to the 36 Chambers"), "Legend" favors complicated lyrical content over the Wu's usual kung-fu cartoons.

The album is cohesive and consistently clever.

It's like reading a book instead of playing Mortal Kombat.

GZA's mic skills may never be as methodical as Method Man's or as bastardly as ODB's, but of all the Wu-Tang clansmen, GZA raps the best stories.

He can flow as multi-syllabically as Ghostface, but he never lets a sound interfere with a song.

He raps about rapping, crime and head-chopping nonsense, but he raps using narratives instead of empty boasts.

"Luminal" is as riveting a thriller as any movie you'd want to rent on Halloween.

"Animal Planet" is the music industry version of "Animal Farm," with various anthropomorphic creatures swindling us human rap fans.

Although Wu-Tang mastermind RZA only produces one song, you can hear his inspiration in most of the other tracks: minor-key piano chords, punchy drum programming and mid-song time changes abound.

"Is it abstract, commercial, or hardcore?" asks the first single, "Knock, Knock."

The album most succeeds when it's all of the above. GZA's greatest strength lies in blending these genres, since he's not always convincing as a genius, pop star or gangsta.

GZA, perhaps one of the Clan's most anonymous members, fails for this same blurring.

"Legend of the Liquid Sword," like any scary campfire story, is more riveting in its telling than in its aftermath. When the CD stops, the legend turns to ash, forgotten.

squad for a challenging match.

"It's going to be a significant jump in difficulty," Bietau said. "They've got an excellent team, and we're going to their place to play them. We know that's going to be a big challenge, and it's also one we're ready to try and take on."

Leading the Rebels will be Mira Radu, the No. 8 singles player in the nation and Ole Miss' lone senior.

Other Rebels in the national rankings include freshman Virginia Tomatis at No. 118 and junior Karem Harboe at No. 120.

K-State also will face the doubles tandem of Radu and Tomatis that knocked off Tulane's Julie Smekodub and Jenny Kuhnthe, the nation's No. 1 team, on Feb. 8. The Cats have yet to lose the doubles point this season.

Bietau said he was pleased with the play of his doubles teams against Utah.

"In doubles, we started a little tight at one and at three but within five or six games figured out what was necessary and played really well after that," Bietau said.

Despite going up against their toughest opponent this season, Bietau is looking forward to seeing how his team responds under pressure.

"I know I'm really excited to see how well we can do and what kind of tennis we can play in that situation," he said.

HEAD START | Program may undergo changes disaster. She said states facing deficits are already cutting pre-kindergarten programs.

"They will not serve the neediest of the needy," she said. "We think this is an unwise move, and we plead with them and the Congress to use good judgment and maintain Head Start intact."

Riley County Head Start serves 165 3- to 5-year old children and 78 pregnant women, infants and toddlers.

The needs of Riley County children, Frick said, are different than any other community. She worries this proposal might force all programs to look the same.

That, Frick said, would weaken one of the greatest strengths of the program.

"Right now, communities can make systems that work for them and address the specific needs of their communities," she said.

Frick said it's frustrating to know that a sucessful program could lose support.

"Head Start offers intensive intervention. That can't be done on a shoestring budget and it can't be done on a one-size-fits-all basis," Frick said.

"I guess right now we have more questions than we do answers, but if the program is working, which I'd say it is, why change it?"

COLUMN | Spectacle necessary aspect to boxing

I want to see the shell of a great boxer go nuts the week before his big fight and get a stupid-looking tattoo on his face.

I want to watch the Tyson-Etienne fight this weekend even though it should be an easy victory for the former champion.

People like me pay to see Tyson go nuts. I am just like the people that wanted to see Ali talk his rhymes and the people that cheered when Marciano gutted his way through that 12th round 50 years ago.

Tyson can put on a show with the best of them.

He has more in common with Ali today than Lewis or Holyfield ever will. It isn't about great fighters. It's about great personalities.

Boxing hasn't meant much to my generation. It was obvious that one fighter 50 years ago meant more to my professor than it ever has to me.

The sport needs new life. It needs new antics and a new crazy man who can rhyme, scream, cuss and most of all, fight.

Boxing needs a new Mike Tyson.

BASEBALL | Wildcat pitchers aim for consistency

"Just show consistency," he said. "He's got good enough stuff. It's just a matter of giving us his A-game every time, and when he has his B-game, he is still going to compete and do an excellent job and keep us in the ballgame in order to go against the other team's best pitcher.

Ripley said it's nice to hear that, but he expected to pitch well in his first start.

"I feel really confident, really good," he said. "It feels so good with him saying that about me. I've still got a lot of work to do and the defense is really behind me.

"You always come out and expect to do well. If you don't, I don't think you'll have the chance to do well. It's good to get a good start under your belt the first time out, and I have to continue to build on that."

Bagley, a junior from Catoosa, Okla., is another junior college transfer Clark is counting on. He wasn't disappointed Sunday, as Bagley (1-0) struck out seven Western Illinois hitters in his first appearance as a Wildcat.

Bagley said he would prefer to start, but where he or the other 10 newcomers fit in will come together in time.

"Us throwing well – everybody throwing well is important," he said. "Who wins, who doesn't win doesn't really matter right now. It's just guys getting innings, guys having quality outings and getting a lot of pitches under their belt.

"The new guys are fitting in some roles that we are going to get a lot of decisions in, especially me and Ripley. Bunn and (Allan) Woodward are going to get some decisions, too."

Clark said he has been pleased with the pitching, but he needs to see consistency.

"So far, so good," he said. "We've only played two teams. The test is the next weeks, and hopefully by the time we get to conference play we'll have a good idea of the identity."

While Ripley was confident in his game, Bagley said his confidence was lacking during the Western Illinois doubleheader Sunday.

"I was surprised I threw the ball at the plate," he said. "I was freezing. I don't think I've ever thrown in weather like that before, so I was a little nervous coming out. After a while, you just forget about everything and you pitch."

K-State will play three games this weekend, at 10 a.m. today against Illinois, 4 p.m. Saturday and at 9 a.m. Sunday against Memphis.

"We need to continue to pitch," Clark said. "Pitchers need to come out and show us they can give us good back-to-back outings."

BASKETBALL | K-State looks to regroup, move on

Hart said. "A lot of these teams are not the best teams in the conference – they just have confidence. If we have confidence and play together, we can win."

Coach Jim Wooldridge said that after hitting the halfway point of the conference season, K-State stepped back and evaluated where it was.

Now three-games into that final stretch, the Wildcats are 1-2.

At this point, the team has a choice to make, Wooldridge said.

"We can regroup and move forward or not," he said. "With five games left in the regular season, I think they know they can play better than this. Hopefully, we can get back to the gym and start over."

A different team

In the past three games (Colorado, at Missouri and Baylor), K-State has struggled in categories it excelled in earlier in the season.

Field-goal shooting: season — 46.3 percent, last three games — 38.9 percent

Three-point shooting: season — 37.2 percent, last three games — 21.2 percent

Opponents' rebounding: season average — 33.3 per game, last three games 40 per game

HIGHWAY | KDOT might delay long-term projects for up to 2 years

priority," Matthews said. "When we go out and improve a road, we aren't doing it to just make it look better. We're making things smoother and safer. Everything we do is a safety project."

However, Matthews said there will be changes in the department.

"If there is a road with a lot of pot holes, or if the road started to crumble, we'd get it taken care of," he said. "It's the major modification projects, like adding lanes to relieve congestion problems. We won't have the money to do those kind of things as soon."

Secretary of Transportation Deb Miller has said cutting modification projects will be a last resort, Matthews said.

"We want to maintain commitment made to those projects, for credibility – not only for KDOT, but for the state," he said.

Matthews said 124 highway-improvement projects were announced in 1999 and 2000. He said the projects were to be completed during a 10-year period.

"We're looking at expanding the program another two years," Matthews said. "It's like extending a car payment. The downside is, you have to hang onto the car for another two years."

Delaying programs too long, however, will have a long-term effect on the state's infrastructure, Matthews said.

"A delay of one or two years won't have an impact on the major infrastructure," he said. "But extending it four to five years will delay getting to other needs and doesn't give you the flexibility needed to meet the demands of the traveling public."

However, the department doesn't yet know what projects will be affected.

Rodney Meredith, assistant director of Riley County's public works department, said the department won't be affected by this particular round of cuts, although earlier cuts have already decreased funding for county roads.

"The county is not seeing the impact on local roads from the $95 million cut, but we could see an impact on state roads in the county," Meredith said.

Matthews said other KDOT programs may be affected.

"We may have to make cuts to other programs somewhere, like public transit in rural and urban areas."

Matthews said the department is dedicated to employees.

"Highway projects employ a lot of people," he said. "Folks building highways get paid, and that ends up back in the economy."

Bad economic times have a direct effect on the state budget overall, Matthews said.

"The problem with the highway budget is that at any given time, the fund has to have a lot of cash on hand to pay for projects," he said.

That's when the state legislature uses the highway budget.

"It's like having money saved up for a house," he said. "You're putting money in the bank and letting interest rates build up. It works fine unless you start taking money out of there. Suddenly, what you had in there is dwindling down, and you don't have any cash flow."

Matthews said KDOT would like some insulation against fund transfers, but he and other state employees understand the enormity of the budget crisis.

"Hopefully, funds will be restored by 2005," Matthews said. "We'll find ways to get through this. There will be a round of cuts, but we'll preserve the core of the program."

He said Kansas placed seventh in a study that ranked the nation's roads. If the department takes similar budget cuts next year, however, road improvements may decline.

"We can't handle cuts again because we will have exhausted all other possibilities," he said. "It's like termites in a house – when the wall starts falling down, it's a little late. You have to keep it in shape to begin with."

FITNESS | Freshman continues 3rd week, varies workout schedule

Shufelberger to keep a record of her diet, logging different food groups and quantities, which might be difficult since she has a meal plan at the residence hall cafeteria.

"Sometimes it's hard because I forgot what I ate, exactly what time or exactly what serving size," she said. "I have to write down every single thing of what I eat, how they fixed it or if you put butter or anything on something. Sometimes it's unclear what to write, especially since I eat in the cafeteria. They just give you a specific serving, and sometimes it's hard to measure that."

Fitness consultant Tiffany Bullard, junior in nutrition and exercise, said Shufelberger has improved her eating habits since last week.

"She's eating more consistently now," she said. "I suggested she increase her fat intake a little more, and she has better protein levels this week."

Bullard said Shufelberger won't have any problem continuing healthy eating habits after the six-week program.

"I think that she can keep it up the rest of her life because it's healthy and offers a lot of variety, but it's not rigid," she said. "That way, she doesn't feel restricted or deprived, yet she's still eating healthy."

However, Shufelberger will occasionally leave the weights and food guide at home for a little relaxation.

"This weekend I went home with my friend, so we had our moms' home cooking, but they both said at the Rec that it's fine because you're supposed to do that every once in a while."

Shufelberger said she was looking forward to taking some time off for spring break.

"I started looking at swimsuits today, so that's going to give me an incentive, I guess," she said.

SENATE | Allocation bill passes

"We're not funding the march, but because what the group is doing, students and community are going to ask us if we support this," Stohs said. "This is not an issue of politics, but an issue of what the group represents."

Those problems, Stohs said, included an incident which occurred at All Faiths Chapel last year during the march.

Senator Layne Stafford, member of the men's glee club, said that during a concert last year at the chapel, the women's march passed by shouting vulgarities and caused a disruption among those in the audience.

Allocations Chair Laurie Quaife said that by funding the event, Student Senate by no means would be advocating one way or another.

Quaife said the Allocations Committee will be able to monitor promotions and make sure funds go toward the speaker, not the march.

"We funded them last year and many years for the same type of the event," she said. "We want to do this as objectively as possible."

Student Senate

The following items were discussed in Thursday night's Student Senate meeting:

- Resolution for Safe Housing Week passed unanimously.
- Revision to the Student Activity Fee Funding Regulations was held for referral.
- An allocation bill to Ordinary Women passed with a 38-8-6 vote.
- An allocation bill for Ahearn support passed 51-1-0.

SALINA | Campus remains stable

she said. "So for now, we are not making any significant changes related to the decrease in numbers this semester."

The campus, however, has already made some significant changes focusing on cost efficiency, Magette said.

"Because of recent budget cuts, we wanted to put in place changes that would allow us to be able to say we are running at the most efficient rate possible," she said. "We made some cost-effective changes in class scheduling and equipment purchases. We can say, without any hesitation, that we have the best possible situation set up.

Because of that, the slight decline in enrollment figures will not dramatically change anything because we never had any fat to begin with."

For now, the school will focus on recruiting and retention, a plan they had in place before the announcement of enrollment figures.

"We are considering expanding our admissions staff," Magette said, "and we are always striving to offer more scholarships. We want to continue to be attractive and competitive for prospective students."

Dean Dennis Kuhlman was unavailable for comment.

Texas A&M (10-13, 2-9) vs. K-State (24-2, 11-1)

7 p.m. Saturday | Bramlage Coliseum (13, 340)

A Shot At Greatness

4 games remain; 5 possible outcomes

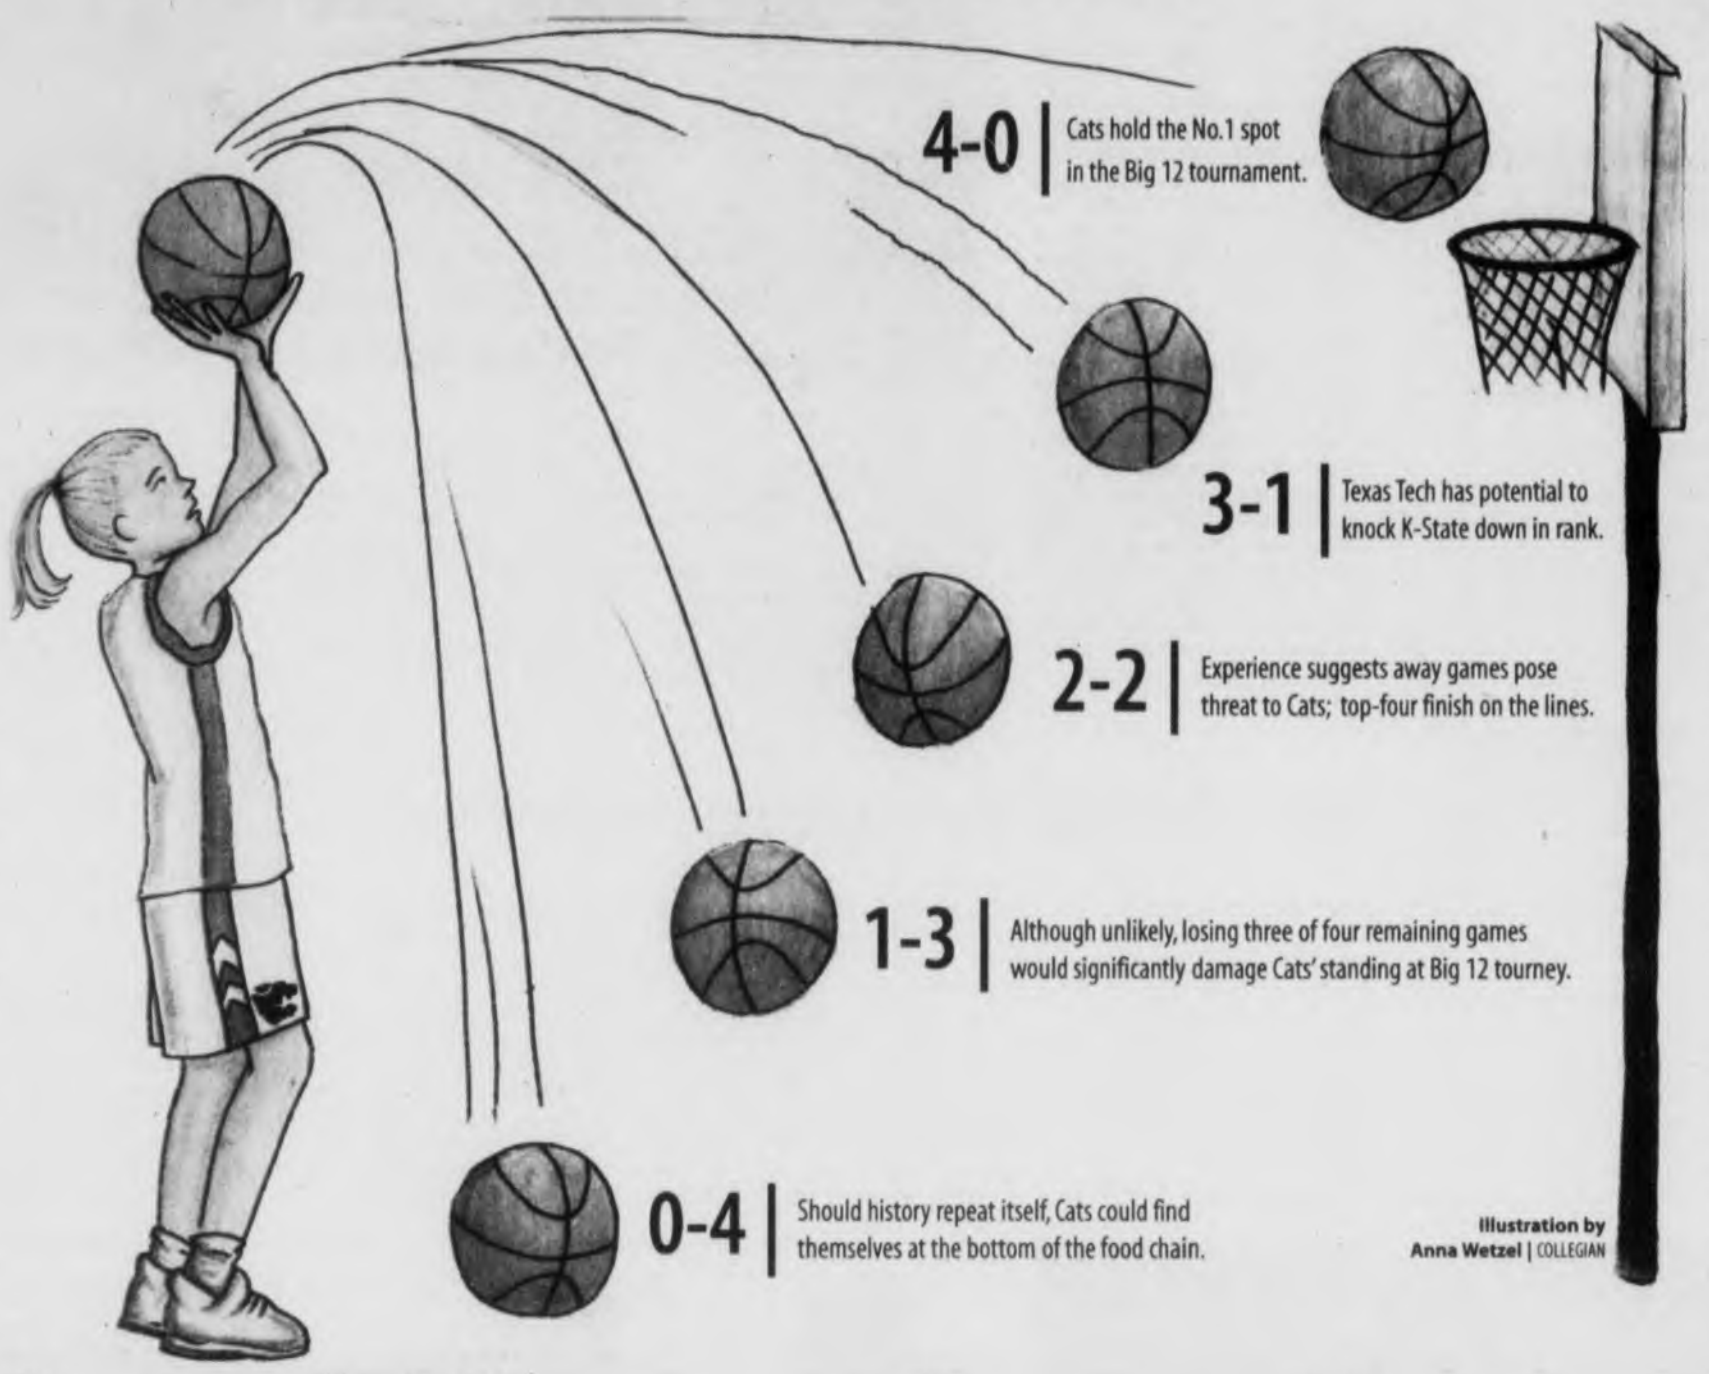

Illustration by Anna Wetzel | COLLEGIAN

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The regular season is a grueling, 29-game war of attrition. It's a roller coaster of highs and lows, victories and defeats, upsets and meltdowns. At stake are conference championships and postseason seeds.

With four games left for K-State, sights are set squarely on Texas A&M.

"We're kind of going one game at a time," junior forward Amy Dutmer said. "Our next focus is A&M, and we'll just go from there."

Sophomore guard Megan Mahoney isn't talking, either.

"We're just looking at it one game at a time, and hopefully we'll be going strong when the postseason starts."

While players are focused on the Aggies, here's a look at what could play out during the remainder of the season:

4-0

K-State is the only team in the Big 12 in control of its own destiny.

Tied atop the conference with Texas at 11-1, the Wildcats hold the tie-breaker over the Longhorns by virtue of a 71-69 victory at Bramlage Coliseum on Jan. 25. If K-State wins-out, their prize will be a first-round bye and a No. 1 seed in the Big 12 tournament.

They will also get a bullseye on their back.

At 27-2, K-State would have the best record in the Big 12 and be heavily favored when the conference tournament opens March 12 in Dallas.

The road to the top seed is daunting for the No. 5 Wildcats, however. K-State ends its season with a two-game road swing.

On March 1, the Wildcats head west to clash with Colorado, and on March 6, the Cats visit Texas Tech. Both teams are fighting for seeding, and Tech continues to hold a glimmer of hope for a conference title themselves.

The No. 1 seed is a coveted prize in the Big 12, considering four of the last five tournament champions have been top seeds. Last season, top-seeded Oklahoma's run to the title included a 69-49 thrashing of K-State in the third round.

A top seed would also mean the Cats would side-step Texas or Texas Tech until the championship game.

Yet K-State has traditionally

Should K-State slip in the final four games, it is likely to be at the hands of Texas Tech. The Lady Raiders sit third in the conference, and stand to gain the most from an undefeated finish.

With the most daunting homestand remaining in the Big 12, Tech can still win the league title. The Raiders finish with games against Big 12 South rival Texas before welcoming the Cats to Lubbock.

Wins in those two games would grant the Lady Raiders tie-breakers over both K-State and Texas, and earn Tech its first conference title since back-to-back championships in 1998 and 1999.

Sophomore forward Kendra Wecker said confidence won't be a problem, though.

"It was really big to get a win at Baylor," she said. "That definitely was a confidence booster, knowing we can win on the road. It's definitely going to give us some confidence when we go to Tech.

"It's my first time going to Lubbock and the atmosphere. Our coaches will get us prepared for the

Two losses would likely mean at least one came on the road either to Texas Tech or Colorado.

The road hasn't been kind to K-State. Both previous losses have come away from Bramlage, and the Cats' only conference loss came on the road Jan. 22 to Iowa State.

Colorado presents a formidable challenge for K-State. The Buffaloes are 10-2 at home, with victories over Oklahoma and Baylor to their credit.

The Wildcats didn't have a problem with the Buffs in their first meeting, however.

K-State held Colorado to a season-low 36 points on way to a resounding 61-36 victory Jan. 11.

Payback can be a large incentive, though.

Another incentive is a top-four finish in the Big 12, which guarantees a first-round bye. Colorado sits at fourth place with games remaining against No. 11 Texas, K-State, and fifth place Missouri.

In 1997, Colorado was the third seed in the Big 12, and clashed with fifth-seed K-State in the inaugural

Three losses in their final four games would find the Wildcats licking their wounds as they limp into the Big 12 Tournament.

They'd also be searching for answers.

With remaining games against Kansas and Texas A&M at Bramlage, a 1-3 finish seems unlikely.

Kansas has slipped further down the Big 12 ladder each season since they won the inaugural Big 12 regular season crown in 1997. The Jayhawks staked claim to a cellar-dwelling finish a year ago, and have a 1-11 conference record in 2003.

That doesn't mean A&M hasn't given K-State fits, though. Last season, the Aggies battled K-State to the wire before falling, 66-61, in College Station.

Forward Amy Dutmer said K-State's sole focus is on the Aggies as they adhere to the motto "one game at a time."

More unlikely than a loss to the Jayhawks or Aggies would be a loss in Bramlage. K-State is riding a 19-game home winning streak, third longest in school history.

The impossible became possible last season.

K-State rolled into Stillwater, Okla., riding a 14-game winning streak. They had knocked off No. 4 Iowa State, No. 8 Baylor, and No. 19 Colorado in successive games. The turn-around in Manhattan was hitting full-stride. The Wildcats were the buzz of the college basketball world.

They scurried out of Stillwater with a 68-60 loss to Oklahoma State.

Whether it was that game in Stillwater or an 86-72 loss at home to No. 12 Iowa State a week later, K-State began to disintegrate.

The Wildcats lost four of their last seven regular season contests, including a 79-58 loss to Colorado, and fell from title contention to a precarious fourth seed in the Big 12 tournament.

There the Cats rallied past No. 14 Texas before falling to eventual Big 12 champion Oklahoma.

In the NCAA tournament, K-State easily skated by Kent State and Arkansas at home before

Patterson expecting Aggies' best efforts Saturday

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Deb Patterson knows her team is in for a fight this weekend when K-State plays host to Texas A&M at Bramlage Coliseum.

That's because there's no greater motivation than desperation, Patterson said.

"The teams in the lower division in this league still have great pride," she said. "They're a great threat and they're going to compete hard."

Patterson's troops will be competing hard, too, but A&M's threat could be intensified when the Aggies' (10-13, 3-9) geographical location is accounted for.

Since A&M competes in the Big 12's south division, K-State (24-2, 11-1) has yet to see what this year's Aggie squad offers.

"I haven't watched them play one minute this year," Kendra Wecker said. "It's like, 'Texas A&M? We don't know anything about them.'"

Nevertheless, the Cats won't be going into Saturday's 7 p.m. tilt blind.

K-State has certainly heard of Tocarra Williams, only the second player in Big 12 history to record 800 points, 500 assists and 300 steals.

And the Wildcats know the Aggies will come out aggressive early and looking to force mistakes in K-State's offense.

"I would expect some pressure from them," Patterson said, "and for them to try to force us to turn it over some, so we do have a little preoccupation with that."

Patterson's club has seen that sort of defensive approach before.

On Wednesday night in Columbia, Mo., K-State fought past several Missouri defensive looks to post its sixth-straight win and fourth-consecutive over the Tigers 66-56.

"They'll come in here with a lot on the line. They're desperate for a win, so you've got to keep your edge, and you can't allow any thought whatsoever about not bringing your best."

Deb Patterson
K-State Women's Basketball Coach

The Wildcats turned the ball over only 11 times in that contest. Patterson will be looking for the same type of efficiency this weekend against A&M.

"Our team should be extremely poised and confident in their ability to compete well over the course of adversity in a 40-minute game," Patterson said. "We've established an ability to do that at a high-level in most situations all year long, and that's a great positive. It's something that our team is beginning to take pride in."

If all else fails, though, K-State will likely hitch the wagon to its scoring horses – All-America and Naismith Award candidates Nicole Ohlde and Kendra Wecker.

Ohlde and Wecker combined for 35 points and 14 rebounds Wednesday night and come into tonight's affair averaging more than 38 points and 17 boards combined.

Regardless of which attack Patterson calls upon, though, the Cat coach knows one thing for sure heading into Saturday's tussle with the Aggies.

"They'll come in here with a lot on the line," Patterson said. "They're desperate for a win, so you've got to keep your edge and you can't allow any thought whatsoever about not bringing your best."

Wecker, Ohlde moving up list of K-State's best

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Deb Patterson compares one of them to Michael Jordan in his hey-day and the other to Shaquille O'Neal of today.

And while Patterson's skills assessment of Naismith Award finalists Kendra Wecker and Nicole Ohlde might seem like a bit much at first, give her 10 minutes to tell you why.

"A lot of times when Kendra Wecker is shooting a 12-foot jump shot, it's a phenomenal play," Patterson said. "We've learned to believe that it's just her, but it really is a phenomenal play."

Wecker's signature move has accounted for the majority of her 19.7 points per game, but her athleticism in the post doesn't just account for baskets.

The sophomore's 8.5 rebounds per contest are good for second most on the team, but it's the shot – that jumper – that surprises even Patterson.

"That mid-range jump shot game is elusive. Not a lot of people possess it because it is a real tough aspect of the game," Patterson said.

"You go with such great power and athleticism and speed, and then in air you've got to alter all of that to a touch scenario. It is a real elusive art, and it's much harder than some people might visualize."

It's also got Wecker rewriting K-State's record books and on the short list for several postseason awards.

With her first five points Wednesday against Missouri, Wecker reached the 500-point mark. And in just her second season in Manhattan, the sophomore has already climbed into the school's top 30 in scoring, rebounds, steals, blocked shots and double-doubles.

On top of that, on Wednesday Wecker was selected as one of 20 finalists for the Naismith award, and the margin between her and Connecticut star Diana Taurasi in ESPN.com's "Wade Watch" – a fan poll predicting the winner of women's basketball's Wade Trophy – is dwindling.

But the Marysville, Kan., product might not even be the best player on K-State's team.

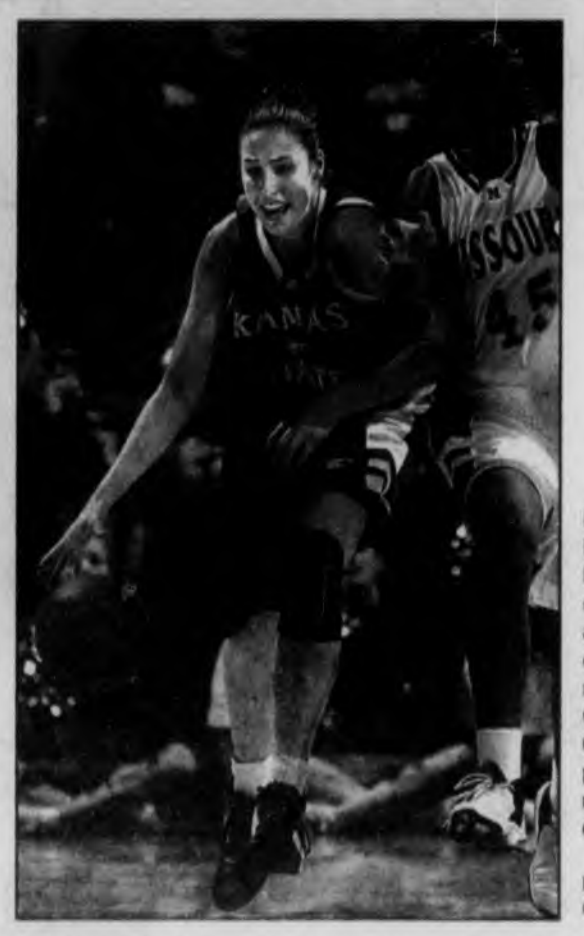
That honor could just as easily go to junior Nicole Ohlde, although if you ask her she'd tell you the praise belongs to her teammates.

"The reason that I get so many looks at the basket is because everybody on this team presents such a problem," Ohlde said.

"Everybody's able to step out on the perimeter, and that leads to some easy baskets for me."

But, like Shaq, someone has to be able to finish those plays.

"Ohlde's a lot more athletic than Shaq," Wecker said. "I would say if Shaq was a girl, Ohlde could take him because of everything she brings. She's just so versatile in everything she can do. It's unbelievable."



Lindsey Bauman| COLLEGIAN

K-State's Kendra Wecker shoots over Oklahoma State's Meghan Craig en route to a 64-46 victory in front of a sold out crowd at Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday. Wecker contributed 17 points during the contest.

Ohlde's statistics are pretty mind-boggling, too.

The oldest of the Wildcats, Ohlde is K-State's all-time leading shot blocker, owns the high-water mark for double-doubles, is fourth on K-State's career-scoring chart, sixth on the rebounding list and threatening in nearly every other category.

"Nicole Ohlde is the real deal," Patterson said.

K-State center Nicole Ohlde brings the ball down the court against Missouri on Wednesday night in Columbia, Mo. Ohlde had 17 points and 11 rebounds in the 66-56 win.

Evan Semón
COLLEGIAN

Opponents know it, too. Double- and triple-teamed since early in her freshman campaign, Ohlde has learned to adjust her game to compensate for different looks.

And adjust she has. Ohlde is the team's leading scorer, rebounder, shot blocker and among the team's leaders in assists.

For both players, the awards come in heaps.

It's tough to find a page in any of K-State's pregame media notes that doesn't have some mention of one or both.

Still, Wecker and Ohlde are staying grounded.

"We're just playing and thinking about the next game and practice when we're not," Wecker said.

"The awards are just something we're honored about, but we're never cocky. We're just going to keep playing and doing the things we love to do – that's basketball, and we both enjoy playing it."

4-0 | Cats blaze path to glory with no more losses

struggled come tourney-time. K-State has never won the Big 12 tournament, failing to make it out of the first round two of the last three years. Since losing to Colorado in the championship in 1997, the Wildcats have yet to return.

Should K-State also claim the Big 12 tournament title, the Cats will be riding a 14-game winning streak, their longest of the season, into the NCAA tournament. K-State will be host to the first and second rounds of the Big Dance, March 23-25, at Bramlage. Tradition shows the Wildcats would deserve a top seed there as well.

In 2002, Vanderbilt, Duke and Oklahoma each received top seeds despite having three or more losses.

With a strong strength-of-schedule the remainder of the season, K-State's RPI is likely to improve. Sitting seventh in schedule rankings as of Sunday, at least three teams ahead of K-State will have lost by the end of the season, possibly as many as five.

3-1 | Cats still in good standing

things they bring to the floor."

If K-State beats Texas Tech and the Raiders upend Texas, the Wildcats would still roll into the Big 12 tournament as conference champions regardless of a late-season loss. If the Wildcats slip to a second seed in the NCAA tournament, as predicted by ESPN.com, they would likely sit in the same bracket as the undefeated defending national champions, Connecticut. This wouldn't be the first time K-State witnessed UConn in the NCAA tournament, however.

Last season, K-State saw All-American Diana Taurasi and the Huskies in Milwaukee, and would have entertained them had they managed to slip by Old Dominion in the Sweet Sixteen.

Wildcats continue to cope with Koehn's injury; other players rise to challenge to cover loss

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN
K-State's Amy Dutmer reaches for a loose ball as No. 5 K-State held off a late rally to beat Missouri 66-56 Wednesday night in Columbia, Mo.

Laurie Koehn has been listed as "day-to-day," for the past six days.

Prior to the game against Baylor on Feb. 8, Coach Patterson said she was "hour-to-hour."

With uncertainty swirling about the return of the sophomore guard, K-State has hardly missed a beat.

The only difference is they've had to march to a different drummer.

Many players have found themselves playing out of position in the wake of Koehn's injury. Some players have had to fill roles for the first time. Stats and leadership both have had to be accounted for.

One player that has stepped up in Koehn's absence is junior Amy Dutmer. The York, Neb., product has found herself on the perimeter for the first time in her career.

"I've gotten a lot more comfortable," Dutmer said. "It's something I had to do because of the numbers on our team."

Accustomed to banging in the middle, Dutmer has been a menace on the glass despite moving to small forward and guard.

She pulled down 11 boards against Oklahoma State on Feb. 15.

Rebounding isn't the only part of Dutmer's game that's improved, though. In her last six games, Dutmer is averaging 6.9 points and 6.2 rebounds per game.

She has even found herself knocking down three-pointers in the absence of one of the Big 12's most dangerous perimeter players.

"Laurie is one of the biggest three-point threats in the league," Dutmer said. "Chelsea Domenico has been shooting threes, so have Kendra and Megan and myself."

Dutmer will attest she isn't the only one playing an unfamiliar position, though.

"We've all worked hard at filling different roles," she said. "We're still working at getting better at it."

Megan Mahoney has found herself taking on a new role, too. At times playing point guard, the Sturgis, S.D., sophomore has come a long way from her post days in high school.

"It's been a whole adjustment since I got here," Mahoney said. "But with Laurie out, Dutmer's had to move to the perimeter, Brie (Madden) has had to play there. I think that's big for our team, being able to make adjustments like that and still win games."

> "If we work our offense, the rest of us will get open shots. It's really just a team effort."
> Megan Mahoney
> KANSAS STATE
> WOMEN'S BASKETBALL PLAYERS

Already a vocal leader, Mahoney has also begun to lead by example. Against Missouri on Wednesday, Mahoney led the Wildcats with 21 points and 12 rebounds. She's averaging more than 13.5 points in her last six games and continues to lead the Wildcats in assists, tallying more than five per outing.

That doesn't mean she's taking it upon herself to carry Koehn's load, however.

"If we work our offense, the rest of us will get open shots," Mahoney said. "We do miss a lot of Laurie's points, and someone has to fill that, but I don't take it upon myself. It's really just a team effort."

Along with guard Chelsea Domenico and center Nicole Ohlde, Mahoney played all 40 minutes against the Tigers.

"It's good for us," said Mahoney. "When it gets down to the end, and we've been playing 40-minute games, we'll have been in those situations. I think it's good for us to have that experience."

Despite individuals filling Koehn's shoes, there are obvious differences in K-State's game plan without the perimeter threat.

In 20 games prior to Koehn's injury, K-State averaged more than 78 points per game. In the last six, that average has dipped to below 67 points. K-State's three-point statistics have fallen, too, as has their overall field-goal percentage.

Defense has become a premium with the loss of Koehn's 13.5 points per game. Allowing 56.1 points per game, the Wildcats have held their last six opponents below that mark.

That doesn't mean people aren't anxiously awaiting Koehn's return, though.

"I know she's dying to get back on the floor," Mahoney said. "If she comes back and is a little rusty, it's understandable. But we hope she can come back and be a force."

After missing two games to injury in December, Koehn erupted in her first game back on Jan. 5, tallying 33 points in a 103-60 rout of Iowa. She scored 25 of those in the first half and hit 10-of-13 from beyond the arc.

With Koehn's return still questionable, Mahoney said one thing is certain.

"We're just taking it one game at a time."

Homecourt advantage will smother Aggies

DAVID SKRETTA

As this week's guest columnist, I've earned the right to bash Texas A&M from here to Junction, Texas.

Usually hampered by journalistic integrity and overall good taste, my foray into columnry bears with it little responsibility. I am no longer shackled to quotes and facts.

Having stated my disclaimer, let us examine our friends from the Lone Star State.

Texas A&M is the self-professed "home of the 12th man." Kyle Field is raucous. Kyle Field is rowdy.

Kyle Field is NOT a basketball court.

K-State will undoubtedly use its own "sixth man" to its advantage against A&M on Saturday at Bramlage. Unaccustomed to playing on the hardwood in front of paying spectators, the Aggies are likely to emerge from the gates shell-shocked.

Flashbulbs will be popping. Wabash will be rocking. More than 13,000 will bear the purple with pride. Aggie eyes will be wide.

Entertaining then-No. 21 Oklahoma on Feb. 5, Texas A&M drew 1,593 fans. Many of them were heard chanting "Boomer Sooner" as they left G. Rollie White Coliseum.

Texas A&M can look back at that loss as a high point in a season of lows, however. Improvement was apparent from the Jan. 18 massacre to the same Oklahoma team in Norman. The Sooners ripped A&M to the tune of 77-39.

There is a fine line that separates good teams from great teams. It was a fine line between UConn and Oklahoma in last year's national championship.

It's a venerable chasm between a good team and Texas A&M.

Among the Aggies' losses this year is an opening blitz from Northwestern State, 65-59.

Who?

I'm a self-proclaimed sports junkie. I eat, drink and breathe sports. I've seen a World Series, and I've been to the NFL Playoffs.

I never knew there was a Northwestern State.

This calls for a tangent.

Northwestern State is located in Natchitoches, La. The Demons are well-known in NCAA I-AA circles for having a decent football team, finishing 2002 9-4 overall. On the hardwood, however, the men's team is a paltry 4-17 while the women have fared slightly better at

COLUMN | Aggies unfit opponents for Lady Cats

11-11.

Not only did the Aggies lose to a mediocre team from the Southland Conference, they also lost at home.

The Aggies have never finished better than eighth in the Big 12 and are considered the proverbial punching bag of Big 12 South powers Texas, Texas Tech, Baylor and Oklahoma.

That proved to be the case when Tech annihilated the Aggies, 83-38 a week ago. The Aggies were held to 25 percent shooting (16-of-64).

Junior Toccara Williams, a Texas A&M 5-9 guard earned second-team All-Big 12 honors by the Dallas Morning News and honorable mention by Big 12 coaches.

She also shot 2-for-12 from the field and committed three turnovers against Texas Tech.

The Aggies will roll into Manhattan sporting an 11-12 record. That record gleams with non-conference victories over Prairie View, Arkansas Pine-Bluff, Texas-Arlington, Wright State and the Mastadons of Indiana-Purdue-Fort Wayne.

Rest assured. Somewhere Bill Snyder is smiling.

Thus, Texas A&M comes to the "Purple Palace" to take on No. 5 K-State in a titanic clash this Saturday.

The Aggies are sure to go down, ass-up, just as the fateful ship did more than 90 years ago.

2-2 | Not good, not bad for Cats

Big 12 Championship. That contest went to the Buffs, 54-44.

Depending upon how the Big 12 leaders finish, K-State, Texas Tech, and Texas all have chances at the title.

K-State still can claim the crown if they beat Tech and the Lady Raiders lose to Nebraska or Oklahoma State.

Texas Tech must beat Texas, however, and the Longhorns must also lose to Oklahoma, Baylor, or Nebraska.

Pause here to digest that scenario.

The NCAA selection committee is notorious for rewarding teams that finish the season on a roll, however, and two losses to finish the regular season would be a blow to K-State's NCAA tournament status.

Last season, Vanderbilt won eight of their last nine, including an upset of No. 2 Tennessee, and were rewarded with a No. 1 seed despite a 27-6 record.

K-State, meanwhile, stumbled down the stretch and fell to a third seed.

1-3 | Cats' record hurting now

This season has seen more people pass the turnstiles at Bramlage for women's basketball than any other. Drawing more than 8,000 fans per game, and more than 10,000 per game for Big 12 contests, K-State ranks sixth in the nation in home attendance.

Should the Cats fall three times, however, the postseason becomes as clear as mud.

K-State could still earn a piece of the Big 12 title, but would need a lot of help. Their win would have to come against Texas Tech, and Tech would have to beat Texas.

In addition, Tech would need to lose to Nebraska and Oklahoma State, and Texas would have to fall to Nebraska, Baylor, and Oklahoma.

Simple enough?

0-4 | Season could end early with all losses losing to Old Dominion in the Mideast Regional in Milwaukee.

The Cats proved momentum can be a great asset.

They also proved momentum can be positive or negative.

K-State won 17 of its first 18 before finishing the season 9-7. Negative momentum contributed to K-State's final three losses, each of which came by margins of greater than 20 points.

Oklahoma, meanwhile, generated enough positive momentum from its No. 1 seed to easily win the Big 12 Tournament and advance to the NCAA Championship Game before falling to undefeated Connecticut.

Should the Wildcats fall in their final four home contests, the impossible will become possible once again.

Brain aneurysm kills student

K-State junior dies Thursday in Wichita

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Melissa Bachman

Melissa Bachman, K-State junior in family studies and human services and member of Sigma Kappa sorority, died early Thursday morning from a system failure, following a brain aneurysm.

She was experiencing some symptoms of headaches on Feb. 14 at work and went to the hospital in Manhattan, said Scott Jones, assistant dean of student life.

She was life-flighted to Wichita, where she went into surgery and then went into a coma.

Alexandria Dunn, Sigma Kappa member, said Bachman's death was unexpected.

"The doctors said those things are unpredictable, and there was no way to tell," she said.

Bachman was involved in Habitat for Humanity and had dreams of becoming a family financial planner, Dunn said.

Dunn said the sorority members have exhibited strength in their friend's death.

"They are pretty strong," she said. "There are a couple of girls that are pretty distraught. I was really impressed how calm and collected they were."

Bachman's funeral was Saturday in Wichita.

There are no plans for a campus-wide memorial at this time.

K-State rodeo brings in crowds, competitors

Lane Fleming, 5, brought a miniature plastic horse to the K-State Rodeo because his stick horse was broken.

Lane, son of Karen and John Fleming, was named after Lane Frost, a professional bull rider whose life story was told in the movie "8 Seconds."

John said Lane enjoys the movie so much at home that his parents annually take him to the rodeo at Weber Arena to see the real thing.

After Friday's rodeo events, Lane met Ednei Caminms, the 2002 world champion bull rider.

Caminms' large, silver world champion belt buckle became the topic of Lane's conversation.

"I have one, too, but it's not that big," Lane said with both hands on his hips.

There were 416 people competing in weekend events and 670 to 700 total entries, David McClure, K-State rodeo coach, said.

Each contestant paid an entry fee for each event. The winners of each event walked away with prize money. The money varied according to how many people entered each category.

On Sunday, the winners of the team roping contest took home $1,334 each. Kolin Vonanin and Jess Teerney of South Eastern Oklahoma State University won the event.

The three divisions of the rodeo include the long-go, Friday's and Saturday's events; the short-go, which is the top 10 from each event; and the average.

Two K-State students made the top-10 category of their divisions and competed on Sunday. Stacia Wood, senior in elementary education, placed sixth and won $54 in the goat-tying division. Kasey Lee, sophomore in business administration, competed in barrel racing and placed seventh with $53.

K-State participates in 10 rodeos per season as well as the regional and national finals if the individuals qualify.

McClure said he felt the rodeo went well, without any serious injuries, but realized parking is always a problem.

He said it is the 56th year for K-State's Rodeo Club to participate in a rodeo and feels that keeping the tradition at the university is important.

"It showcases a part of the culture that seems like it's disappearing although it has some of the best athletes in the world," McClure said.

Expense reports filed Friday; 2 presidential pairs file on time

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Only two of the remaining four presidential tickets turned in their expense reports before the 4 p.m. Friday deadline, elections chair Mark Threeton said.

John O'Hara and Travis Stryker reported $2,445.16 in expenses, while Tammy Jo Osborn and Julie Quackenbush reported spending $969.97. Eric Hoopingarner and Layton Ehmke turned in their report Sunday afternoon, and reported $298.63 in spending.

Julia Hiles and Ashleigh Sumner told Threeton they had no expenses to report.

Ali Karimi and Jared Kyner officially withdrew from the race Friday afternoon, Threeton said.

Threeton said he will review past rulings before deciding which actions to take regarding the late report filings. Although Hiles and Sumner said they did not spend any money, they still are required to turn in an expense report, Threeton said.

"The most important thing is to be consistent with what's been done in the past," Threeton said.

The expense report breaks down all the money candidates have spent on the election so far, Threeton said, and may include some products they have not yet used. Receipts and an explanation are required for each expense.

Last year's expense reports showed Matt Wolters and Mandy Achilles spending $2,599.88, and eventual winners Zac Cook and Todd Kohman spending $2,593.67 before the primary elections. No other candidate last year

Pair withdraws from race

Karimi cites academic obligations as motive

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A set of candidates for student body president and vice-president has withdrawn from the presidential race.

Ali Karimi, senior in economics, and Jared Kyner, junior in pre-medicine and nutrition sciences, dropped out of the race Friday afternoon, Mark Threeton, elections chair, said.

Kyner said Karimi dropped out of the election because he was worried about being overloaded with upcoming tests.

"Ali said he was worried he wouldn't be able to devote enough time to the campaign because of a whole bunch of tests this week, but I said I'd take over his part," Kyner said.

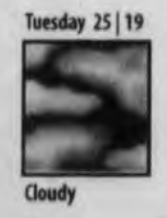
Kyner said he convinced Karimi on Sunday to put their name back on the ballot and was planning a campaign rally at Aggie Station with local bands.

However, Threeton said the deadline to file was Feb. 11 at 4 p.m., so the pair can't re-enter the race.

"They've signed to take their name off the ballot, and their name has already been removed from the ballot," he said. "It's too late to file now."

Threeton said the filing deadline is going to be strictly enforced because there is a lot of legwork to do between the filing date and the primary elections.

"Once you remove your name from the ballot, there is not re-entry," Threeton said. "It's not stated, but that's how I'm planning to run the election. In order to be fair to everyone, it's a process that needs to be carried out."



Karimi was unavailable for comment.

Dion sells home, buys land at exclusive Palm Beach golf-course development

Illustration by Adam Hayes COLLEGIAN

JUPITER, Fla. – Celine Dion plans to build a new home in one of Palm Beach's most exclusive golf-course developments.

Dion, who recently sold her previous Jupiter home, paid $3.5 million for 3 acres of waterfront land in Jack Nicklaus' The Bear's Club.

The 34-year-old singer said she chose the community for its "exceptional privacy and security."

"We love the Jupiter area," Dion said in a statement e-mailed to The Palm Beach Post. "We love Jack and Barbara Nicklaus and their family."

Dion opens next month at Caesars Palace hotel-casino in Las Vegas for a three-year concert engagement.

The Bear's Club is less than a mile from her previous home, which she sold two months ago for $9 million, plus another $7 million for furnishings.

Her husband, Rene Angelil, "has often said they want their son to go to school in the Jupiter area," family spokesman Jon Greene said Wednesday.

Clinton praises Bono

NEW YORK – Bill Clinton thinks Bono is a leader "we should follow in the new millennium."

The former president praised the lead singer of U2 Friday at a celebrity-packed reception honoring Bono's charitable work, most notably his efforts at promoting awareness of the AIDS epidemic and famine in Africa.

Clinton credited the rock star with helping close partisan gaps and getting Congress to pass a bill to provide debt relief for Africa.

"He did something I couldn't do: He convinced Jesse Helms (former Republican senator from North Carolina) to be for it," Clinton said, adding: "I love this man because he has a mind and a heart."

In accepting the award from the recording industry charity MusiCares, Bono talked about possible U.S. military action against Iraq.

"We do not need to make a martyr out of Saddam Hussein," said Bono, a nominee for the Nobel Peace Prize last year.

"It is not as simple as war or no war. These are complex problems, and we need complex solutions."

Besides Clinton, others feting Bono were New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, singer David Bowie and actor Robert De Niro.

Gwen Stefani, Mary J. Blige, B.B. King, Jimmy Fallon and Wynonna Judd were among those performing at the event.

McCartney plays birthday bash

LONDON – Wendy Whitworth, executive producer of CNN's "Larry King Live" and a huge Paul McCartney fan, received an unforgettable 50th birthday present: a private concert from the former Beatle.

Whitworth's husband, financier Ralph Whitworth, came up with the unusual gift idea and offered McCartney $1 million to do the San Diego gig. McCartney agreed, saying he would donate the money to the anti-landmines charity Adopt-A-Minefield.

Wendy Whitworth, broke into tears when her husband announced McCartney was taking the stage before 150 guests, including Katie Couric of NBC's "Today" and King.

Near the end of the 90-minute set, which included the Beatles' classics "Let It Be" and "Yesterday," McCartney called Wendy Whitworth on stage and presented her with 50 roses. The band then went into the Beatles' song "Birthday" while the Whitworths danced at McCartney's side.

The show served as a warm-up for McCartney's upcoming tour of Europe, which starts next month.

Afterward, McCartney said: "Ralph gets to be the great husband for organizing the surprise, his wife gets a rocking party, I get to rehearse the band for the tour, and most important, Adopt-A-Minefield gets one million dollars."

Cesar winners accept awards

PARIS – American winners at the Cesars – France's version of the Oscars – used their acceptance speeches to thank the French for their anti-war stance on Iraq.

Michael Moore, whose gun violence documentary "Bowling for Columbine" was honored as best foreign film, brought the audience to its feet Saturday when he applauded France for trying to slow the U.S. drive to war.

"Thanks for showing us the way, and for taking up a position on something very important," Moore said. "A real ally, a real friend, is someone who tells you when you're wrong."

Director Spike Lee, presented a career award, thanked the French for "knowing the difference between the American people and American foreign policy."

In impeccable French, actress Meryl Streep accepted her own career award "in the spirit of international understanding."

Roman Polanski's "The Pianist," set in the Warsaw ghetto during World War II, was the most honored film Saturday, receiving seven awards, including best film, best director and best actor to Adrien Brody.

"8 Women," a campy murder mystery starring Catherine Deneuve, Isabelle Huppert and Emmanuelle Beart, was nominated for the most Cesars – 12 – but was shut out.

Auction sells items autographed by Lennon

COPENHAGEN, Denmark – A 1970 calendar autographed by former Beatle John Lennon sold for $4,412 at an auction.

Two Christmas cards signed by Lennon's second wife, Yoko Ono, and their son, Sean, fetched $2,868, twice the projected price.

Those items and others auctioned Saturday belonged to Aage Rosendahl, who was a school principal when he met Lennon and Ono during a trip they made to northern Denmark in 1969.

The two were visiting Ono's then-5-year-old daughter, Kyoko, who lived there with Ono's ex-husband, Tony Cox.

Rosendahl, 82, decided to sell the memorabilia "because he believes it's time to pass it on to others," auctioneer Hans-Joergen Eriksen said.

The auction raised $8,618, which Eriksen said Rosendahl plans to donate to peace groups in Denmark "in line with Lennon's spirit."

Lennon was shot and killed in New York in 1980.

3 K-State-Salina pairs vie for presidential bid; students to vote in primary

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three pairs are vying for K-State-Salina's Student Governing Association's top positions, and starting Tuesday, students can vote for the pair they think best represents the campus.

After students vote, two pairs will move on to the general election on March 4 and 5.

Paul Homan, Doug Zerr

Homan Zerr

Combined, the pair has acquired leadership experience from numerous organizations during two years of attending school. For them, running for office was the next logical step.

Paul Homan and Doug Zerr, sophomores in mechanical engineering technology, are campaigning for student body president and vice president, respectively on the campaign slogan, "Experience that works."

"We were interns. Now we are both senators, so seeking a higher office seems like the next step in the process," Zerr said.

The pair is focusing on three platform issues. The first is campus-wide recycling.

"Right now there is kind of a paper-recycling program on campus," Zerr said, "but the majority of our waste is plastic. If we could implement a full-fledged program on campus, it would benefit everyone."

The second – keeping people involved – stems from a lack of campus involvement on the weekends.

"Now, it is hard to maintain numbers because so many students in the dorms leave on Friday," Homan said.

"We want to have monthly programs that keep all students involved."

Zerr said the programs would be educational and fun, but they would allow students a chance to become more active in the community and on campus.

Finally, the pair wants to make sure paid positions on SGA are held accountable for the duties they are required to perform.

"In SGA, we have paid positions that require time and effort," Zerr said.

"Our job is to keep paid positions on task and doing the jobs required of them on a regular basis."

Eric Runner, Mark Frederick

Runner Frederick

They had a bad experience, and now they want to make it right.

When Eric Runner and Mark Frederick, freshmen in professional pilot and airway science, wanted to start an organization on campus, they presented a proposal to Senate, but it wasn't as easy as they thought.

"Long story short, we ran into a lot of problems trying to get recognized through SGA. It was a mess," Frederick said. "We are running for office now to make it easier for students to come to Senate and talk to their senators."

The pair did start the organization – Keeping People Social – and now they are setting their sights higher.

Runner and Frederick are running for student body president and vice president, respectively, and are focusing their efforts on two platform issues. The first deals with the experience they had in Senate.

"Our big goal is to go out and talk to students," Frederick said.

"We want to know who they are, and we want them to know what we are about. It is one thing to actively campaign by interacting with students, but once you get elected, that conversation must continue."

To avoid conflicts with the SGA Senate, Runner said the pair would constantly be pressuring senators to talk to their constituents to make sure they are accurately reflecting the students they represent.

"Our main goal is to bring students back into SGA," Runner said.

"We want to make students more aware of events, and senators more aware of student organizations and interests."

The second platform issue – better communication with the Manhattan campus SGA – is one that Runner said is needed.

"A lot of people don't even know there is a Salina campus," he said.

"We want to work with Manhattan and try to increase relations with the senators there."

To accomplish this, Frederick said the pair would attend meetings on the Manhattan campus and work with them to accomplish joint goals.

Robbie Sanders, Chad Sanders

R. Sanders C. Sanders

They have different motivations, but their goals are the same.

Robbie Sanders, junior in professional pilot and airway science, and his brother Chad Sanders, sophomore in professional pilot and airway science, running president and vice president, respectively.

Robbie's motivation to run is a desire "to take on a more challenging role with greater responsibility." While Chad wants to "lead the K-State-Salina campus to bigger and better things."

But their three platform issues are ones they both agree on. The first – an effort to unite the campus – will allow campus organizations to appoint a member to SGA.

"They will be an non-voting member, but have full speaking rights," Chad said. "They will basically act as a liaison between SGA and campus organizations."

The platform stems from the pair's experience in SGA – they are now both senators.

"Organizations and clubs will come before Senate and want us to allocate funds to them," Robbie said. "The problem is there is mistrust sometimes on what they will do with the funds because the senators have never heard from them before. If we had a representative in Senate from that organization, the knowledge and education would already be in place."

The second issue will be to develop a bridge between college life and professional life.

"We want to have more guest speakers and professionals on campus," Chad said. "The end result will be a valuable connection for students to the work force, and it also will allow them to hear from speakers who have experience in the field they are interested in."

Finally, the brothers say they will develop a concrete plan of action for the roll-over account from last year's SGA.

"We want to see a plan come to life before the break for summer," Chad said. "We want to make sure those funds are spent in the best possible way."

Businesses get boost from local rodeo crowds

Manhattan showed its earning potential again this weekend.

During the 47th Annual K-State Rodeo at Weber Arena, hotels were booked, restaurants were packed and business was booming.

Let's hope organizers looking for venues to stage their events take heed of our city's hometown hospitality and consider all Manhattan has to offer.

Last spring, Bramlage Coliseum was the site for two rounds of the NCAA Women's Basketball Tournament.

Fans from around the country made the trip to Manhattan and injected the local economy with dollars. The same happened this weekend with thousands of rodeo fans swarming to K-State for its fantastic event.

The same will happen this March, when the NCAA Tournament returns to Bramlage.

Make sure you're part of the environment too. We all play a part in making sure Manhattan is a great place to visit.

Boxing is a sport and a science — not a spectacle. If you don't know anything about boxing, don't write about it.

I just want to say I just walked from Aggieville to Brittany Ridge. I am the poster child for why there should be a SafeRide program. Thanks.

Damn, I'm cold!

OK, so I was making out with this guy, right, and he called out another girl's name. Talk about a mood breaker.

Yeah, to the car who just did the Chinese fire drill: Yeah, we really appreciate that and the three cars you let just go ahead of us.

Why can't a single girl in this town just find a guy that's willing to make out for a little while. Is that really too much to ask?

Whoever pulled the fire alarm in Haymaker, I just want you to know that you interrupted my mad monkey lovefest.

Is it cheating when God gives you the answers?

Did anybody else out there see that little leprechaun guy at the K-State/Iowa State basketball game?

Hello, this is Bart. And I tell you to keep it Jesus, because Jesus is real. And it's all Jesus, because Jesus is good. Much love, dawg.

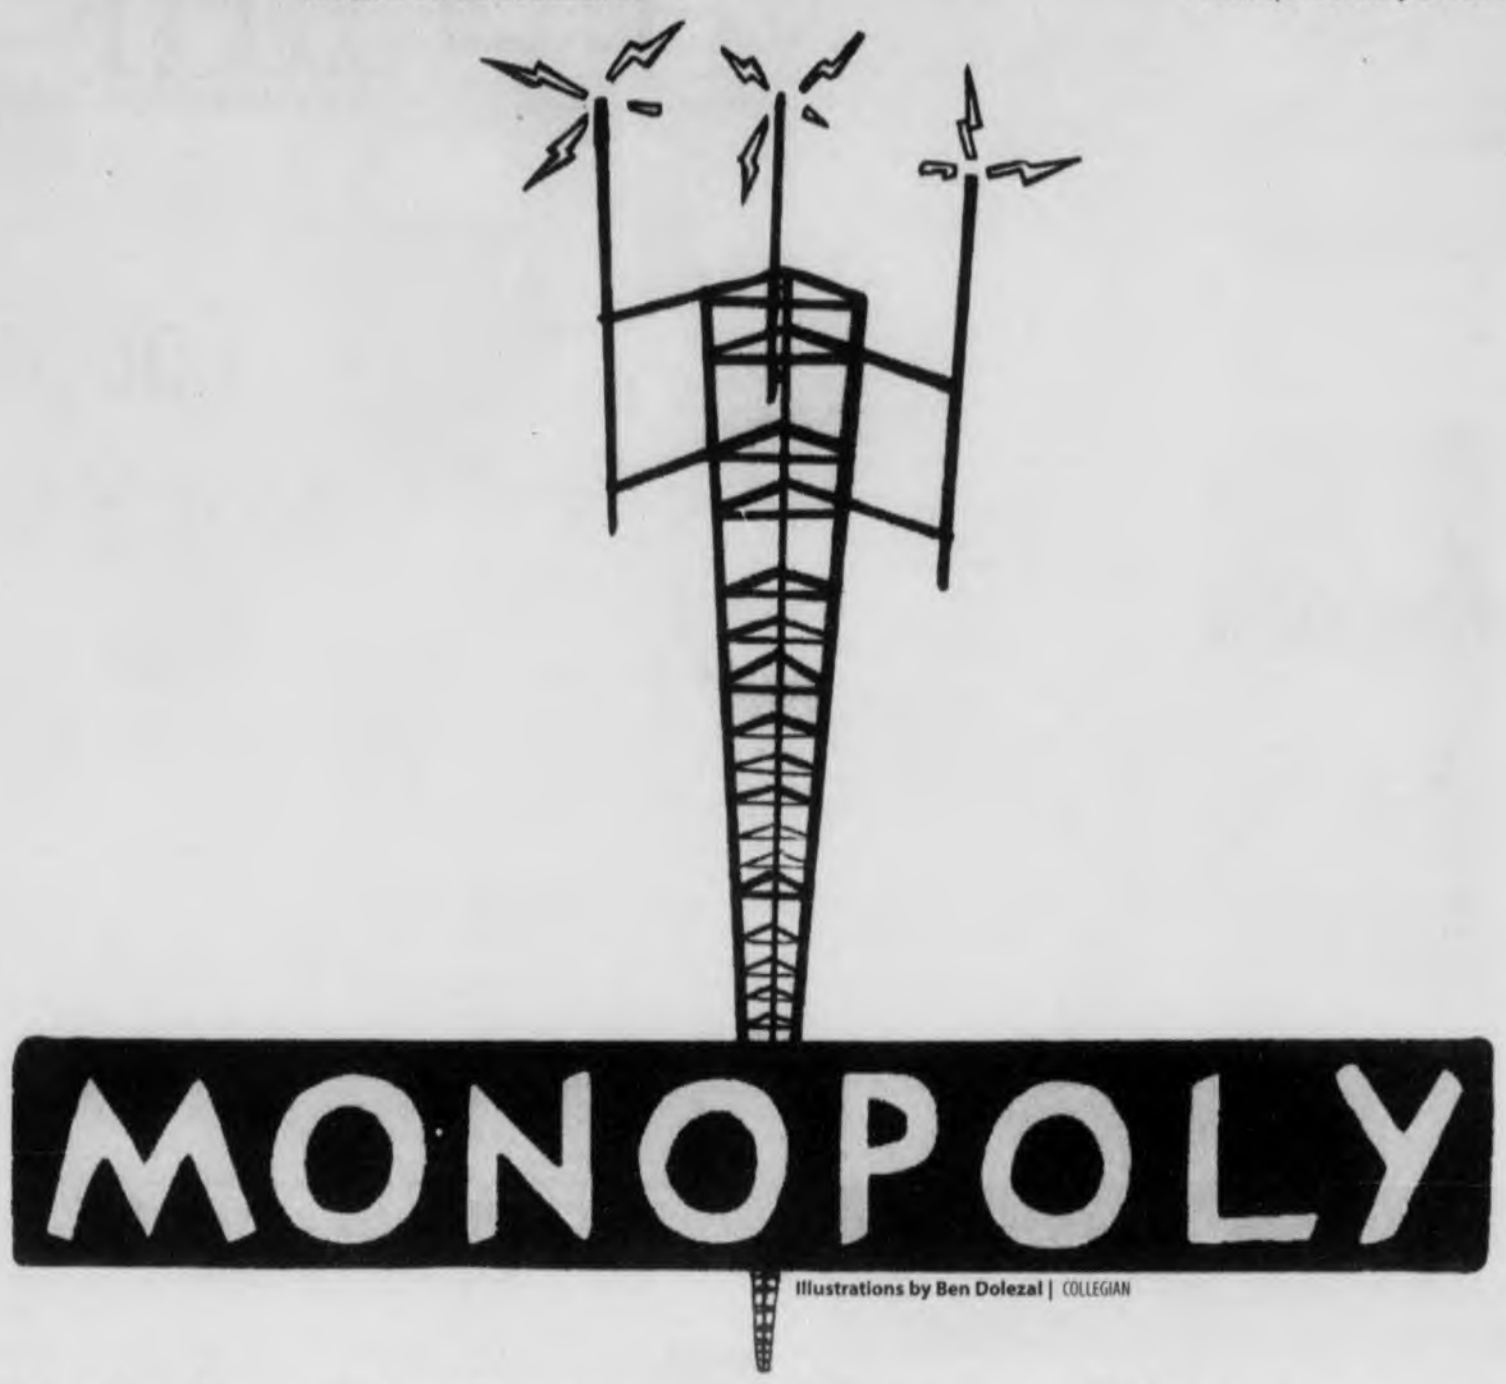
A wise man once said, life is a garden. Dig it.

My roommate is so trashed that she wanted to hump a midget's leg.

How 'bout we have the Kansas State Rodeo in Bramlage and stick basketball in Weber because Rodeo draws a bigger crowd?

My friend just asked a girl out to supper. Supper? Are you serious?

Were you the one that looked at me, who smiled at me? Or were you the one that beat me senseless and took my lunch money?



You know, last night my boyfriend told me I was so pretty that I could be a model. Isn't that sweet? Yeah, and then he got some.

Boys have a penis. Girls have a vagina.

Well, you might as well have a summer beer because it's summer somewhere.

The female body is like a work of art. The male body is utilitarian. It's like a Jeep.

Musical variety hampered by consolidated power

FLETCHER JACOBS

The other day, while switching dials on the radio, I heard an ad for a local top 40 station.

"We don't play music that makes you scratch your head and go, who's that? We only play No. 1 hits."

Now, I applaud this type of honest advertising. Imagine if Wal-Mart did this: "Saving you pennies on the dollar as we suck your local economies dry." Or Varney's: "Yeah, we sell books high, buy them back low, and then jack prices up again next semester. But what are you going to do about it? You have no other choice! Ha, ha, ha."

But I still find this ad disturbing. They brag about the fact that no boundaries will be pushed nor any support will be given for artists not backed by major record money. They claim to play what the people want to hear. But how would people know any other music? They aren't going to buy $15 CDs without preview of the music. So people think this is good music.

My hero Johnny Cash's recent album contains some of his most powerful material. And for a man who turns 71 on Wednesday, that is saying something. His version of Nine Inch Nails' "Hurt" far surpasses the original and blows me away. But I bet you've never heard it. And you won't on radio here. Somewhere, though, Kid Rock and Sheryl Crow sing a duet.

In 1996, the Telecommunications Act deregulated the ownership of radio stations, opening the doors for monopolies to be built across the country. Since that time, the number of radio owners has dropped from 5,100 to 3,800.

This act is now being evaluated in Congress to allow even more consolidation to further relax limitations on station ownership in one market. One company, Clear Channel, owns 1200 stations. All this consolidation leads to a homogenization of sound. We all get the same music, all the time.

Radio ownership says there is more diversity, choice and local control now. Yeah, right.

It is easy to say there are different format choices. The formats play the same music. There are no real choices.

As a Rec Complex employee know, we have three radio stations with different formats, but they all play the same thing. Adult contemporary, No. 1 hits, top 40 – all are just different ways of saying that if you haven't heard John Mayer or Pink in the last 10 minutes, just wait another five. I once tried to keep tally of how often I'd hear the same song during a four-hour shift but stopped after trying to stab my ears out with a pen.

Their local control claims must refer to the oft-played general recorded messages by Rick Dees or another syndicated disc jockey mentioning how great Manhattan or K-State is. It's like they are right here. The local control could come from the local disc jockey punching in songs from the small and select playlist from the owners that really expose lesser-known artists like Jennifer Lopez.

Disc jockeys used to be real personalities. They would decide upon and play their own music. The mid-90s' Lazer 105.9 from Lawrence is a great example. It played a great eclectic mix of music. Of course they were bought out and are now a top 40 station. Somewhere, a Matchbox Twenty record plays.

This goes beyond the brainwashing of people to think Nickelback is a good band because of its radio play. A monopoly in radio is wrong because radio is a public medium. Concentrating the power in fewer hands gives them the choice of what we hear. But more importantly, what we don't hear.

Go back to Clear Channel's list in the aftermath of September 11th for an example. Worried about the effect some songs could have, they created a "suggested" list of songs to not play. Included were those scary folkies Peter, Paul, and Mary and the always-dangerous Don McLean. God help us if we'd turned on our radios to hear that menacing "Get Together " by the Youngbloods about loving one another.

When you own a third of the market, it is easy to silence quite a number of voices. Think about the power in that. The New York Times pointed out last week that we don't have any protest songs being played, like Crosby, Stills, Nash & Young's "Ohio."

How would we know if there were any protest songs at all? Where are we going to hear them? Corporate America wouldn't allow dissident songs on the air in today's world. Since there is no independent choice, the public won't hear these voices.

But rest assured that, somewhere, a Creed song plays.

Duct tape can be used for more than industrial, utility purposes

AIMEE NOEL

"Duct tape is like the force. It has a dark side and a light side, and it binds the universe together."

This is perhaps one of the best quotes from the Fourum, and it's little wonder because it's so very true. What other single item on the face of the planet can be used for anything from revenge on your ex to art to saving your cat? There's no doubt about it, duct tape is king.

Duct tape got its start during World War II. It was invented in 1942 for the U.S. Army as a water-proofer for ammunition cases by Johnson and Johnson Permacel Division. The soldiers found it to be extremely versatile and used it for everything from the intended purpose to repairing things like guns, jeeps and aircraft. Due to its waterproof nature, it was quickly dubbed "duck tape."

After the war, its color was changed from army green to silver to match the color of duct working, and the name was changed to duct tape.

Today, the only brand of duct tape called Duck Tape is Duck Tape brand, and they sell it in many different colors. It comes in traditional gray, red, yellow, green, blue, brown, black, and Duck brand has recently introduced Xtreme colors such as lime green, blaze orange, citron yellow and hot pink. And for the outdoor enthusiast, camo tape can be purchased as well. A special type of tape made for the entertainment industry called Gaff tape is usually flat black and very strong. The job title Gaffer can usually be found in the movie credits.

There are four different grades of duct tape: utility, all-purpose, professional and industrial. Utility is your general, joe schmoe duct tape and can be used for temporary purposes such as holding white board markers when the original clip or Velcro dies.

All-purpose is better than utility and can be used to annoy people by taping them to chairs or, in a more constructive way, repairing binders or other things with tears or holes.

Professional is described by Duck Tape brand as the best and is perhaps best used silencing people who don't know when to shut up, as an art tool or as decoration. It also has its practical uses such as repairing broken pencils or waterproofing things.

Industrial is like the Incredible Hulk of duct tape and is best to add to your survival kit as recommended by the Homeland Security Department, repairing wobbly lofts or for making sticky traps to catch a squirrel of your very own. For those who are gung ho about their duct taping, the quality is best determined by looking at the weave of the fibers in the tape. More fibers and tighter weave equal better tape.

Uses of duct tape include the phrase, "if it moves and it shouldn't, duct tape it." You can duct tape on anything as long as it's clean and dry and you don't mind sticky residue if you ever intend on removing it.

Should you ever find that you need to remove your duct tape from any surface and that the sticky residue must be removed as well, use duct tape's counterpart, WD-40. It helps to remove the sticky residue and is handy to keep around as well, just in case something should move and it doesn't. Other products include Duck Brand adhesive remover and Goo-Be-Gone.

So, should you ever find yourself in a bind in which something needs to be stabilized or something should move and it doesn't, just remember this: Duct tape and WD-40 are like the force and R2-D2 – if one can't fix it, the other one will.

COOLING HOT BREATH

Prevention, treatment of bad breath as easy as gum care, proper teeth management

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jessica Kinzel knows that what she is doing isn't good.

She knows it won't yield positive results.

But she likes Taco Bell, and she's not concerned about its effects on her breath.

Kinzel, a junior in management information systems, said she has been in close quarters with people who have had bad breath, and it's not something she enjoyed.

"My basketball coach," she said. "He'd just get in your face, and you'd have to look the other way."

Kinzel's experience is not limited to coaches, though. Bad breath can be a widespread problem. Dan Dempsey, a Manhattan dentist, said it usually is easily prevented.

"The big key is working the tongue," Dempsey said. "It's full off fissures and cracks, so it's a good place for odor to hide."

Dempsey said a yellow film on the tongue is one of the primary causes of bad breath. Brushing the tongue or using products such as a tongue scraper to remove the film can improve breath, he said.

This film is especially problematic in the morning, Dempsey said, so getting rid of it is essential in eliminating morning breath.

The tongue is not the only culprit, however. Dempsey said bacteria around the gums, plaque and gum diseases can cause bad breath.

Brushing regularly and flossing once a day are both important steps in preventing bad breath.

Gingivitis, a condition where gums become red and bleed during brushing, is a sign that there may be odor-causing bacteria in the mouth, Dempsey said.

Darren Foltz, pharmacist at Dunne's Pharmacy, also said some foods can cause undesirable breath odors. Also, keeping the mouth moist, using a saliva substitute if necessary, can help fend off bad breath.

But Foltz agreed the most important step to preventing bad breath is to clean the mouth regularly.

In some cases, however, this is not enough.

Foltz said some people have underlying origins of their bad breath, such as acid reflux. In such cases, Foltz recommends seeking a medical expert for advice to solve the problem.

Products that claim to help eliminate bad breath, such as mints and mouthwashes, are not always effective, Foltz said.

Usually, the product is intended only to cover up bad breath instead of solving the problem by eliminating its source. Some mouthwashes, though, do kill bacteria and can help in curing bad breath.

The American Dental Association's Web site said the ADA cannot vouch for the effectiveness of most products, but the site suggests looking for products with the ADA seal of acceptance. There also are bad-breath kits, which may or may not be effective. Foltz suggested asking a dentist about using such products.

"There's no holy grail," Foltz said, "other than regular hygiene."

The cause of bad breath is rarely known, Kinzel said, but the social effects are usually obvious.

"It's a turn-off," Kinzel said. "You don't want to talk to him if he has bad breath. It usually seems like a hygiene problem – and probably Taco Bell, too."

So fresh, so clean

To help prevent bad breath, Dr. Dan Dempsey recommends taking the following steps:

- Brush your teeth at least twice each day
- Brush your tongue, and use products such as tongue scrapers if necessary
- Floss at least once per day

Theater companies sued over pre-movie commercials

The practice of showing commercials before the start of movies defrauds the public and should be stopped, according to lawsuits filed against two movie theater chains.

The on-screen commercials delay the start of films beyond the posted times, which deceives theatergoers, the lawsuits alleged.

The class-action lawsuits were filed Tuesday in Cook County Circuit Court against Classic Cinemas and Loews Cineplex Entertainment.

Both ask that theaters state films' actual start times in their ads or pay no more than $75 "for anybody who's had to sit through these things, millions of people," attorney Mark Weinberg said.

Drew Carey honored with star on Hollywood Walk of Fame

Comedian Drew Carey received a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame placed, appropriately enough for an ex-Marine, in front of The Supply Sergeant military surplus store, a Hollywood fixture for decades.

Carey, 44, has played a variation of himself — a prank-loving, beer-swilling Cleveland native — on ABC's "The Drew Carey Show" since 1995 and also hosts the improv comedy show "Whose Line Is It Anyway?"

His star, the 2,216th placed on the Walk of Fame, joins him with such other recent honorees as director Steven Spielberg and actress Nicole Kidman.

Century team should honor past coaches

The 2002-03 men's basketball season has been a roller coaster ride that hit a season-low this weekend against Iowa State.

There is little or no interest shown for this team right now by residents of Manhattan, and students attend at only a marginally better rate than the townies. Yes, average attendance is up a little this year, but we owe a lot of that to how many KU fans showed up Feb. 8 to Bramlage Coliseum.

TOM FONTANA

Tons of Jayhawk fans scooped up the extra tickets, and no one seemed to care – we need something to create some interest in this team.

Last Wednesday, 6,576 people supposedly showed up to watch the Baylor game, possibly the worst game in the history of the sport. If you were there, I think you'll agree with me – that count is very generous.

The Cats usually are a good draw for the students, along with the other team's fans, but where are the season-ticket holders? The purple chairback seats on the west side of Bramlage are half-empty during most games.

Interest has to come from somewhere.

Maybe the consensus top-20 recruiting class next year will create a stir. Let's hope Coach Jim Wooldridge can fill a few more seats with 6-foot-7 Cartier Martin, a highly ranked small forward from Texas.

Or how about Dez Willingham, a point guard from Texas. Or Lance Harris, a shooting guard stolen from right under the Missouri Tigers' noses in Columbia, Mo. Then there's junior college transfer Jeremiah Massey from Oxnard College in California, who is averaging a double-double this year.

All four guys are having great years at their respective levels, and fans can be hopeful about their ability to carry those skills to this level.

K-State's basketball history is fantastic: names like Rolando Blackman, Mike Evans, Ed Nealy, Mitch Richmond and Joe Leonard. OK, not Leonard, but coaches like Jack Gardener, Tex Winter and Jack Hartman are amongst Wildcat lore.

I know they've been doing this all-century team this year, but what good is that? All we see is a 30-second piece on the Jumbotron about that player. Why not invite some of those players back to retire their jerseys? It seems like they've retired a jersey at nearly every game at KU this year.

But K-State has no numbers hanging from the Bramlage rafters. Hang Richmond's No. 23, hang Blackman's No. 25, but we'll save Leonard's No. 33 for another time.

What about the coaches? Well, two of K-State's best coaches are no longer alive, in Gardener and Hartman, and Winter has had plenty of ceremonies in his time.

In the Big 12, there is James Nasmith Court in Lawrence and Norm Stewert Court in Columbia. I say we put Jack Hartman's name on the Bramlage floor right here in Manhattan.

The guy was an amazing coach, and there is nothing that could draw more Manhattan natives to Bramlage than a ceremony for Hartman.

He has the most wins in school history with a career record of 295-169 at K-State, including three Big Eight Championships. He took the Cats to seven NCAA Tournaments and the regional finals in 1981, when K-State beat second-ranked Oregon State, earning the Cats the cover of Sports Illustrated that week.

When he died on Nov. 5, 1998, a memorial service was held in Ahearn Field House, and rightfully so. His record was 177-47 in the building.

Nothing would better serve the Wildcat basketball fans of the glory days than to honor the man that led K-State to so many places. It might finally create some interest in men's basketball in "the Little Apple."

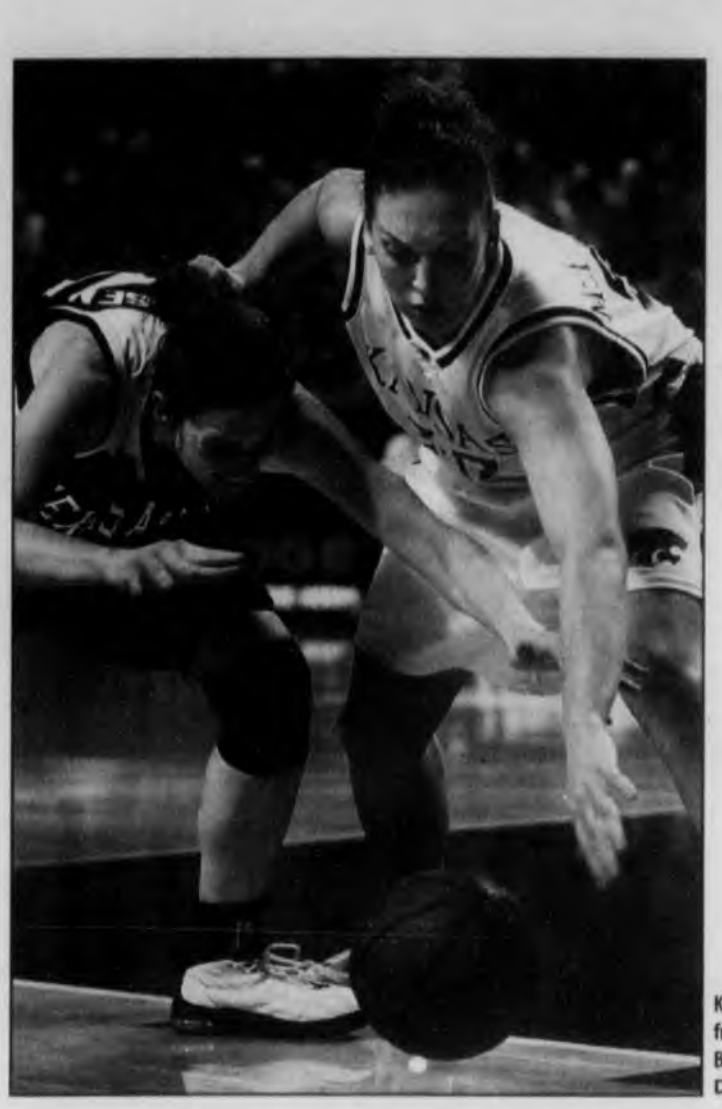
Wildcat weekend wrapup

Baseball | Illinois spoiled a 4-inning no-hit bid by K-State freshman southpaw Jared Bunn on Friday and posted a 10-7 win in game one of the Service Academy Classic in Millington, Tenn. K-State's final two games of the tournament were rained out.



Tennis | No. 58 K-State lost its first match this season when it fell to No. 40 Mississippi, 5-2, on Saturday in Oxford, Miss. The loss snapped a four-match winning streak for the Cats, their best start since 1989.

Men's basketball | Jake Sullivan scored 25 and Adam Haluska hit two free throws with 18 seconds left as Iowa State came from 16 down to beat K-State 64-61 Saturday. ISU broke a four-game losing streak and sent K-State to its 14th straight conference road loss.

Equestrian | Sara Zurliene won high-point honors Sunday after Jacuie Griffin did the same Saturday, at King Farms in a show hosted by Southern Illinois in Marion, Ill. K-State finished third on Sunday with 26 points but won its fourth consecutive victory Saturday.

Track | Coby Cost set the K-State school record in the men's weight throw for the fifth time this season (68 feet, 6 1/2 inches), while Wildcat senior Amy Mortimer hit an NCAA automatic-qualifying time in the women's 3,000 (9:16.77) with her second-place finish, highlighting action Saturday in the KSU Open indoor track and field meet at Ahearn Field House.

SHUT DOWN

Defense, rebounding key to Wildcat victory on Saturday

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Just how good was No. 5 K-State's defense in the Cats' 88-49 thrashing of Texas A&M on Saturday?

Notes from the blowout explain the dominance effectively:

• Brie Madden's 18th career two-block effort pushed her season total to 42, the fifth-highest season tally in Wildcat history.

• Junior Amy Dutmer set a career-high for steals with three. Nicole Ohlde and Megan Mahoney each had three as well, and the Cats (25-2, 12-1) tallied 12 as a team.

• The Aggies (10-14, 3-10) were the latest in a string of 16 K-State opponents to shoot 36 percent or worse from the field.

• The Cats booked 18 fast-break points and scored 22 off A&M turnovers to post the team's seventh-straight double-digit win.

K-State's defensive dominance isn't anything new, though. The Cats have held their last 21 opponents to a combined 34.8 shooting percentage, including a 30.9-percent mark from 3-point range.

"Our defense has really become a consistent power for our basketball team," Coach Deb Patterson said.

To be fair, though, the Aggie offense doesn't intimidate many of its foes. A&M came into the contest averaging only 61.8 points per contest on 39-percent shooting.

On Saturday, however, the Aggies couldn't even meet those marks.

"There were a couple times down the court we had open looks and great shots," A&M coach Peggie Gillom said.

"They just didn't fall."

The Aggies' 28.6-clip Saturday wasn't their worst performance of the season, but it came close. Oklahoma and Texas Tech each staked A&M to 25-percent performances.

Gillom said the Aggies' date with the Cats felt like those contests.

"Texas Tech and Oklahoma are physical, and so is Kansas State," she said.

Patterson's troops were content with how they countered the Aggies' offense.

"It was very important," Ohlde said. "Everything really starts on the defensive end – just getting our hands up in passing lanes."

That philosophy produced 12 Wildcat steals and allowed just nine Aggie assists on the day.

"To be successful in this league and at the next level, you've got to be able to defend and rebound the ball well," Patterson said.

K-State won the battle on the glass, too, 44-28. The Cats' tally included 11 offensive boards that led to 13 second-chance points.

Patterson said that among the team's top goals for its final three games, concentration on rebounding and defense remain near the top.

"It's certainly something you have to bring every single night," she said.

Best defensive team ever?

The 2002-03 Cats still have some work to do to be named the best defensive team in the program's history.

2002-2003	Category	K-State
34.9	Percent shooting	29.1 (1973-74)
29.5	3-point percentage	27.3 (1990-91)
55.8	Points per game	38.9 (1973-74)
40.2	Rebounds per game	43.9 (1980-81)

K-State's golf teams need strong starts

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If NCAA golf tournaments were only 36 holes long, K-State's men might be one of the top-ranked teams in the nation.

That said, Coach Tim Norris' team must play 54 solid holes today in San Antonio, Texas, at the Roadrunner Invitational, played on the par-72, 6,691-yard Oak Hills Country Club.

"I wish I could say or do something that would help us do that," he said. "Getting off to a good start is obviously the goal every time we go out.

K-State will go against tough competition in San Antonio, including seven teams ranked in the top 75 of the Golfweek/Sagarin ratings.

"It's a competitive field," Norris said. "You play 54 holes of golf, you've got all that golf being played by five different people, and then you sit there Tuesday afternoon and look at the scoreboard, and one shot separates everyone.

"A lot of times you'll see first and 10th place separated by less than 10 strokes," he said.

The K-State lineup will include freshmen Ben Kern and Josh Persons and juniors Greg Douglas, Aaron Watkins and A.J. Elgert.

Elgert missed the spring's first tournament after injuring a finger playing pick-up basketball, but he'll return to action this week.

"He will go to San Antonio with us," he said. "He's had a good week of practice with no residual pain or swelling from the injury."

K-State sits at No. 46 on the Golfweek/Sagarin ratings, but Norris said the team still has its best golf ahead of it.

File photo by Karen Mikols | COLLEGIAN
Aaron Watkins putts in the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate tournament in September 2002 at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

"It's a measuring stick," he said. "It's pretty valid. I tell the players every time we go to a tournament, we've got a chance to either improve our position or to send it in the other direction. I think it's a source of pride.

"I don't think we've played our best golf by any means," Norris said. "I illustrated for the guys that if we take the three tournaments we finished third in last fall, if we had one stroke better in those rounds by each of the players, we would have won those three tournaments."

The 15-team field will play the first two rounds today, beginning at 8 a.m. The final 18 holes will be played on Tuesday, beginning at 8 a.m.

Women to open spring slate

After one of the most successful fall seasons in school history, K-State's women begin their spring in Parrish, Fla., this week.

The two-day, 54-hole Central District Classic will begin at 8 a.m. today with 36 holes at the par-72, 6,113-yard River Wilderness Country Club.

Seniors Miranda Smith and Elise Carpentier will lead the Wildcat contingency in experience, but juniors Christine Boucher will go into the tournament with the highest expectations.

Boucher finished with K-State's best score in four of five fall tournaments and had the Cats' best stroke average last term (73.40). She also finished in the top 10 four times.

As a team, K-State finished the fall No. 37 in Golfstat's rankings – the highest spot the program has ever achieved – and the Cats placed in the top five in all but one tournament.

K-State also won the Sunflower Invitational in Wichita on Oct. 15. The Cats' 54-hole 903 at the event set a school record, but that mark fell later in the season when K-State shot an 874 at the Edwin Watts Collegiate on Nov. 5.

The final 18 holes will start at 8 a.m. Tuesday.

Junior Karen Quintelier and sophomore Sarah Heffel also will make the trip for K-State.

spent more than $1,000.

O'Hara's and Stryker's biggest expense was for 365 T-shirts, on which they spent $1,938.64. They spent an additional $148 on color copies.

Osborn and Quackenbush spent $641.60 on 150 T-shirts and $193. 43 on posters.

Hoopingarner and Ehmke spent $189.92 on handbills and $91.21 on a banner.

Candidates also reported smaller expenses, such as tape, staples, string and other miscellaneous items.

Bill Harlan, interim assistant coordinator of Student Activities and Services, said candidates are required to report expenses as a way of maintaining fair elections.

"We didn't want candidates to come in and throw all their own money around," Harlan said.

Each presidential pair is restricted to contributing $800 to its own campaign, Harlan said. There is no limit on how much candidates can raise from individual contributions, but no individual can contribute more than $20.

Harlan said he does not believe spending the most money will guarantee victory in the elections, but that it is a good indicator of who is seriously pursuing office.

"What you usually see is students who are active. Money is not an issue, but it's an aspect. You can see them active, visiting more groups, talking to more people and raising more money," he said. "The results reflect the amount of effort put into the race."

The primary elections, which will narrow the four presidential tickets to two, are from 8 a.m. Tuesday until 6 p.m. Wednesday. Students can vote at www.sgaelections.k-state.edu.

FEES | Student Publications receives fee increase

yearbook and student phone book.

Fees will increase by $16,000 for the fiscal year 2004 or a total cost of $7.86 per student per semester. The following two years will increase by $31,000 and then $30,000.

Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications, said he projected a loss for the next three years if the fee was not increased.

"We are at the tail end of low fees," Johnson said. "The next steps would be more drastic."

Options would be incurring a per paper cost for the Collegian, cutting circulation numbers or minimizing student employees.

> "I love the Collegian, but it's the biggest source of waste on campus."
> Erin Green
> PRIVILEGE FEE COMMITTEE MEMBER

Committee member Tanner Kingzell said he had supported the fee request.

"If we are dealing with an award-winning paper, I have no problem with an increase," he said.

However, committee member Erin Green said the Collegian is also harmful to K-State.

"I love the Collegian, but it's the biggest source of waste on campus," she said.

The privilege fee committee also agreed to author legislation that will add a privilege fee to help implement the SafeRide program.

The program idea was first introduced after a plebiscite vote last year showed students were interested.

Voting totals from spring 2002 showed that 2,692 students thought they would benefit from a SafeRide program, while 566 students disagreed.

The SafeRide task force proposed a plan that would contract out five cabs from Thursday through Saturday, from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m.

As long as one person in the cab could show a student ID card, they could be taken to their Manhattan residence.

The fee, $70,966 per year, will only be in place for one year, and will be reviewed again next fiscal year.

The fee will cost students an extra $1.78 per student per semester.

U.N. seeks approval for resolution

By Edith M. Lederer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS – Seeking U.N. approval for military action against Iraq, the United States, Britain and Spain submitted a resolution Monday declaring that Saddam Hussein has missed "the final opportunity" to disarm peacefully.

British Ambassador Jeremy Greenstock formally submitted the resolution to the Security Council on behalf of the three countries.

But France, Russia and Germany, which oppose the war option, circulated an alternative plan to pursue a peaceful disarmament of Iraq over at least the next five months. China said it also supports that proposal.

The rival positions set the stage for a heated battle over whether the council would back the U.S. and British demand for war now or the French, Russian, and German call for war to be "a last resort."

Getting approval for the U.S.-backed resolution will be a daunting task. To pass, the resolution must have nine "yes" votes and avoid a veto by France, Russia or China. Eleven of the 15 council members want to see U.N. weapons inspections continue; Bulgaria is likely to support the U.S.-

DEBATING THE ISSUES

3 presidential pairs debate platform issues in panel

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sunday's snow might have spoiled their sidewalk chalkings, but yesterday three of the four pairs of candidates running for student body president and vice president tried to gain support and further their platforms through debate.

Jeremy Stohs, senior in political science, served as the debate's moderator, posing both collective and individual questions to the candidates.

When asked about the biggest problem facing K-State in the next year, presidential candidate Eric Hoopingarner said the budget shortfalls are the most important issues confronting student government.

Classroom renovations and improved technology were mentioned as a key concern by Hoopingarner, and he said that these projects shouldn't be sacrificed because of financial troubles.

Hoopingarner said higher tuition is inevitable, but if elected, he said he would focus on other ways to make school more affordable, including an online book exchange, free concerts and updating Title IX by creating more scholarships for female athletes.

"Fees are going to go up, but it's up to you to decide if you want to pay more money on top of that," Hoopingarner said.

Presidential candidate John O'Hara also said the state budget cuts that have reduced the university's revenue by $20 million over the last two years are the biggest obstacles facing the next student body president. He said student government will have to find ways to address larger class sizes, canceled classes and the 120 unfilled faculty positions.

Even with the reduced budget, O'Hara said the increasing tuition rates should create more money to be spent on campus. He said that raising tuition will generate another $10 million for the university next year and that $1 million of the additional tuition revenue will be allocated for use on campus.

"We want to make sure that we're seeing visible improvements on campus and make sure the administration knows where our priorities lie," O'Hara said.

Presidential candidate Tammy Jo Osborn said budget cuts are a serious problem, but that the leadership of Student Senate will be able to address the majority of those concerns, freeing the student body president and vice-president to concentrate on other issues.

Osborn said if elected, she and Julie Quackenbush would focus on communicating what is going on in the student government with the student body. Implementing PULSE, a student-led activist group aimed at increasing student involvement in government, would be the main goal of their administration, Osborn said. Letting students know where their money is going, Osborn said, is critical during a time of budget cuts and tuition increases.

"Information is what makes a democracy survive," Osborn said.

Primary elections will begin today at 8 a.m. and conclude Wednesday at 6 p.m.

After initial questions, audience members were given the opportunity to ask questions about specific aspects of the candidates' platforms.

When Hoopingarner was asked about the cost of moving the K-State versus KU basketball game from Bramlage Coliseum to Ahearn Field House, Hoopingarner said he was unsure of all the logistics, but after talking to members of the athletic department he said the cost should be around $25,000.

O'Hara was asked where he would find funding for raising the wages of the 4,000 students employed by the university and the salaries of graduate teaching assistants. O'Hara said they would use $475,000 of the $1 million in tuition revenues designated for use on campus to pay for the raised salaries.

Quackenbush explained to audience members how their administration would enhance student interaction with government and they would expand voter registrations and lobbying days. She said that in order to prevent further budget cuts and to keep education affordable students need to speak to their representatives, so the legislators know faces and stories from K-State.

Candidates Julia Hiles and Ashleigh Sumner were unable to attend the debate due to class conflicts.

The debate, held in the Union Plaza, was co-sponsored by the Union Programming Council and the K-State Political Science Club.

Voting for SGA primary elections begins today

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Voting for the Student Governing Association presidential primary elections will begin at 8 a.m. Tuesday and continue until 6 p.m. Wednesday.

To vote, students must log onto www.sgaelections.k-state.edu and enter their eIDs and passwords. All votes must be placed online, said Bill Harlan, interim assistant coordinator of student activities.

Once a student is logged onto the elections Web page, directions will lead students through the remaining steps to vote. Students will not be required to log onto KATS before voting, as they were in last year's election, Harlan said.

Results from the primary election will be announced on KSDB-FM 91.9 around 7 p.m. Wednesday, elections chair Mark Threeton said.

Threeton said he expects the tally to be official by about 6:30 p.m. Wednesday, but is allowing additional time before the scheduled announcement because he is unsure of how quickly the new voting system will count the votes.

The balloting system is being handled by K-State this year, after problems with last year's vendor, iBallot.com, prevented certification of the initial election, which

Change necessary for students to participate in elections

By James Hurla

Students who did not meet the Feb. 12 deadline for changing their eID passwords will not be able to vote in the Student Governing Association elections until they change their passwords.

Bill Harlan, interim assistant coordinator of student activities, said many students may have overlooked the requirement that passwords must be changed once each semester. Students who missed the deadline will be able to change their passwords and vote in the primary election Tuesday and Wednesday.

Rebecca Gould, director of the Information Technology Assistance Center, said students can visit www.eID.k-state.edu to change their eID passwords at no cost. Students are not required to change their eIDs, formerly known as a K-State computing ID.

A red, highlighted icon will lead students through the proper steps to

Corrections and clarifications

There were errors in Monday's Collegian. Melissa Bachman died from an arteriovenous malformation. Also, in the profile of K-State-Salina's presidential candidates, Paul Homan's and Doug Zerr's names were switched underneath their pictures. The Collegian regrets the errors.

NEWS OF THE WEIRD

Burglar falls asleep in store, leaves money trail behind

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

The burglar who apparently broke into the A Little Bit of Country western emporium in Mineral Wells, Texas, on Feb. 8 was arrested shortly after the store opened at 9 a.m., in one of the state's easiest collars: He had fallen asleep on a bed in a furniture showroom.

A few coins (the only money on the premises) were scattered on the floor. He had left his gun in the store's restroom. And of all the places in town, he had picked a store owned by the wife of the Palo Pinto County district attorney.

High tax revenues

Though state tax revenues are shrinking nationwide, Kansas reported in January that taxes paid on marijuana sales were up 5 percent and taxes paid on cocaine, methamphetamine and other hard drugs were up 20 percent.

As other states do, Kansas sells revenue stamps (in denominations from $10 to $1,000) that dealers are supposed to affix to the drugs in order to sell them. Even though such sales themselves are illegal, law enforcement agencies are forbidden from accessing information on the sellers (and if they did, any conviction would probably be tossed out, as based on unconstitutional self-incrimination).

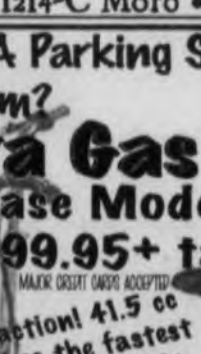
A Revenue Department spokesman guessed that most people who buy the stamps are merely collectors.

Woofers and tweeters...

A January Wall Street Journal report described "dB Drag Racing," a "sport" in which the winning car is not the fastest but the one with the loudest stereo system, but ordinary urban street cruisers are not in these drivers' league.

In the "Extreme" category, cars are completely rebuilt and powered with enough juice to operate several private homes. Extra-thick glass and concrete poured into the floor and doors keep the sound inside, where the measurement takes place.

War news



People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals wrote to Yasser Arafat deploring public bombings, at least when the bomb is delivered (as one was on Jan. 26 in Jerusalem) on a donkey.

Said a PETA official, "It's not my business to (comment on) human wars."]

And to help the U.S. military, a Las Vegas porno distributor offered 500 videos free of charge (except for postage) to servicemen as thanks for their sacrifice.

And in Cebu, Philippines, in February, a German man, Frank Oesterle, was detained by police after knifing an American tourist at a bar; they were arguing over their respective countries' views on imminent war in Iraq (i.e., U.S., fight; Germany, don't fight).

Can't possibly be true

Gloria DeFrancesco, 61, filed a lawsuit in Akron, Ohio, in December against TV evangelist Ernest Angley, alleging that the muscle men who surround the stage during his healing sessions roughed her up in August 2001 while she was accompanying her 94-year-old, wheelchair-using, generously tithing mother to be cured.

DeFrancesco said she was struck, grabbed and pushed by six men, resulting in a detached retina and other head, nose and body injuries that required hospitalization and surgery.

The BBC reported in January that Holger Voss has been ordered to court in Muenster, Germany, accused of breaking its law against "glorification of a criminal act."

According to a complaint to police, Voss had written on an Internet message board, "Congratulations to the murderers of (Sept. 11)." Voss told a BBC reporter that he obviously meant to be sarcastic, but court spokesman Juergen Wrobel said that would be for the court to decide.

Standing order

Freshman Missouri state Rep. Cynthia Davis, at a legislative orientation session in December in Jefferson City, took her turn at learning how to preside over debates and interrupted Rep. Chuck Graham, who had the floor.

According to a report in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Davis recited the rule that members must be standing in order to speak and that Graham was out of order, in that the veteran legislator Graham has been in a wheelchair for 21 years, the result of a car accident.

Least competent criminals

Tyrone Jermain Hogan, 20, pleaded guilty in Los Angeles in February to attempted carjacking, six months after trying to steal a van that unbeknownst to him at the time was carrying a martial arts team visiting from Florida International University; the students, said their instructor, held Hogan "like a pretzel on the ground" until police arrived.

And Edgar A. Brown, 27, was arrested in Worthington, Ohio, in January and charged with robbing the First Merit Bank; police were tipped off after Brown paid his electric bill using red-stained $50 bills.

Our civilization in decline

In a still largely underreported 1996 study by St. Louis University (revealed by the St. Louis Post-Dispatch in January), researchers concluded that at least 40 percent of Catholic nuns in the United States have suffered either sexual abuse, sexual exploitation or sexual harassment, with nearly half of the instances perpetrated by priests or other nuns.

The results were published in two journals, but the study's sponsors squelched the news out of a desire not to harm the Catholic church's then still-virtuous reputation.

Primary elections voters' guide

Julia Hiles

Ashleigh Sumner

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

President: Julia Hiles
Vice-President: Ashleigh Sumner

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what do you think will be the most important issue affecting students during your term?

A: With the education budget as tight as it is, students need to know that they have people in office who will strive to use their money as efficiently as possible.

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what is your primary goal to accomplish during your term?

A: We want to listen to student concerns and eliminate expenses they feel are unnecessary. By increasing efficiency throughout campus, we'll assure that students receive the most for their education dollar.

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what is another important goal that you think you can accomplish during your term?

A: We'd like to increase awareness about the importance of fitness and health on campus. We propose a fitness council to promote physical activity and monitor fitness levels among students.

Eric Hoopingarner

Layton Ehmke

President: Eric Hoopingarner
Vice-President: Layton Ehmke

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what do you think will be the most important issue affecting students during your term?

A: Keeping the costs for a quality education down, while increasing opportunities on campus.

To do so, we must provide students with better classrooms, better equipment and more available activities.

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what is your primary goal to accomplish during your term?

A: To work with students and use their ideas to create more opportunity on campus, without requiring any more student funds. Examples include an online marketplace to trade books, tickets, etc.

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what is another important goal that you think you can accomplish during your term?

A: We hope we can bring more entertainment to students without raising costs. Examples include a free student concert, more comedians and moving the men's K-State/KU basketball game to Ahearn.

John O'Hara

Travis Stryker

President: John O'Hara
Vice-President: Travis Stryker

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what do you think will be the most important issue affecting students during your term?

A: Students do not want to see new programs that will cost them more money. Seeing visible improvements on campus from the increase in tuition revenue is the most important issue.

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what is your primary goal to accomplish during your term?

A: To make students aware of our four initiatives, show we have access to the resources to accomplish these initiatives and to hold the administration and Faculty Senate accountable.

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what is another important goal that you think you can accomplish during your term?

A: We believe keeping an open line of communication is essential.

In addition, we are committed to being proactive by making student organization visitations a priority during our term.

Tammy Jo Osborn

Julie Quackenbush

President: Tammy Jo Osborn
Vice-President: Julie Quackenbush

Q. In 30 words or fewer, what do you think will be the most important issue affecting students during your term?

A:Students will face challenging issues ranging from state and university budget crises to the looming threat of war. K-Staters must be able to vocalize their opinions concerning these crucial issues.

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what is your primary goal to accomplish during your term?

A: Our platform issues focus on uniting the three main branches of our university community: current Wildcats, alumni and future recruits. This cohesion will ensure K-State's continued success.

Q: In 30 words or fewer, what is another important goal that you think you can accomplish during your term?

A: Communication and cooperation with the K-State student body form the foundation of our campaign.

With these essential aspects in place, PULSE, UUSR, SIP and New Wildcat Weekend will be achievable.

Junior overcomes anorexia, helps others with disorders

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

She wanted control. Control of the pain, the depression and the poor body image she had endured since being sexually abused as a child.

That's when Tiffany Bullard, junior in nutrition and exercise, became anorexic – restricting her food and exercising obsessively.

"My eating disorder was my coping mechanism," Bullard said. "It provided a narrow focus for me. Losing weight – that was my focus. That way I didn't have to deal with all the other things that were actually causing my anxiety and depression."

After years of suffering, Bullard shares her story with others as she continues to recover from the disorder. As president of Sensible Nutrition and Body Image Choices – SNAC – Bullard, along with other peer educators, speaks to about 25 sororities, fraternities, residence halls and other campus organizations each semester to help prevent eating disorders and educate students on nutrition and health. National Eating Disorder Awareness Week, Feb. 24-28, will be no exception.

Bullard said sharing her experience with others is part of the healing process.

"It's been such a really hard, terrible experience, but it's for a purpose," she said. "I don't want other people to go through what I went through."

Bullard said she began restricting her food during her sophomore year in high school.

"It gradually progressed from there," she said. "It really got bad toward the end of my junior year in high school, and it just got worse from there. My freshman year here, I had very severe anorexia."

Although Bullard never completely stopped eating, she barely consumed any calories and began to exercise compulsively.

"It's a downward spin, where you lose weight and think you're so fat," she said. "You lose more weight and eat less. Eventually, you take it to extremes that are dangerous."

Bullard's depression, anxiety and desire for perfection helped fuel the disorder that was causing malnutrition and other health problems. As her depression worsened, so did her eating disorder.

Her self esteem and her weight dropped dramatically. She also said she felt societal pressure to be thin.

"I was a straight-A student and varsity cheerleader and was really involved in clubs and organizations at high school," she said. "I was trying to be the best that I wanted to be – and I wanted to be perfect. I wasn't about to say I had an eating disorder because I thought I was fat. I thought, 'I could never be anorexic because I never stop eating.'"

By the end of her freshman year at K-State, Bullard had had enough.

"I was clinically depressed. I felt horrible. I hated myself, and I felt fat," Bullard said. "I was not suicidal, but I definitely didn't want to be around anymore. I was sick of being that way, and I just wanted to do something to help me get better."

Bullard sought help from specialists like Dianna Schalles, registered dietitian with Nutrition Services at Lafene Health Center.

Schalles said Bullard is not alone.

"About 50 percent of what I sees are eating disorder patients, including anorexia, bulimia and binge eating patients. There's no one reason behind eating disorders – there's a variety of factors," Schalles said.

These factors may include societal pressures, dysfunctional family dynamics, a perfectionist personality, a history of teasing about weight or a history of physical or sexual abuse, Schalles said.

"Because there are so many underlying factors, it takes a lot of work to recover," she said. "The average recovery time is currently around seven years. It's definitely not an overnight fix."

According to the National Eating Disorders Association, 5 million to 10 million females and 1 million males struggle with partial or full eating disorders after puberty. And those are conservative estimates.

However, local help is available.

The Manhattan Eating Disorder-Body Image Task Force was formed Feb. 14 to combine services at K-State, Manhattan public schools and Mercy Health Center. The task force has scheduled activities throughout the week to educate the public about eating disorders.

Teresa Sandborn, dietitian at Mercy Health Center, helped form the group.

"The first year, we are just hoping to join efforts, increase awareness and build on that each year," she said. "When I heard there were sixth-grade girls not eating their lunches, I thought, 'We've got to get to them before it's too late.'"

Prevention efforts may have come too late for Bullard, but she's joining the effort. Bullard is a fitness consultant at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and teaches people how to eat right.

She is also studying women's studies and plans on receiving her master's degree in social work so that she may dedicate her life to helping others with eating disorders.

"If I can help someone else, it's like I just didn't go through it for nothing," she said.

City Commission candidates address prominent issues

The following Manhattan residents are running for three City Commission positions. Primary elections today will eliminate one candidate from the April 1 general election.

Marolyn Caldwell
retired Manhattan resident

Q: Why are you running for City Commission?

A: "I don't like the way that things are moving right now, and so I threw my hat in the ring so I could make some changes. I like this city. I'm giving back for the wonderful childhood I had."

Q: If elected, what are some issues you'll be facing?

A: "The privatization of public services, the traditional neighborhood overlay district and the multi-family rehabilitation. That's an area close to campus where the city has looked and determined that most — if not all — of the houses in these particular blocks are completely rental so they will allocate that particular part of the city for high-density housing."

Danny Callahan
graduate student at K-State

Q: Why are you running for City Commission?

A: "A combination of a couple of different reasons. First being when I was in Student Senate, I had a couple of road blocks with the City Commission. They weren't too receptive to anything the students were bringing forward. Second, I've always had an interest in politics, and plus I'm from Manhattan so I care about what happens to the city."

Q: If elected, what are some issues you'll be facing?

A: "Budget issues and housing and planning issues. Do we bring in certain businesses? Where do we build houses for students? And cooperation between the county government and K-State and different entities in Manhattan."

John Collinson
engineer at Reeve Plumbing Heating and Engineering

Q: Why are you running for City Commission?

A: "To make the city a better economical development. I have a lot invested in the city. I live in this city. I'm a tax payer. I want to make sure taxes don't dry out homeowners."

Q: If elected, what issues will you be facing?

A: "For economic development, it's always needed to look at the budget and the taxes."

Mark Hatesohl, chiropractor at the Chiropractic Family Health Center

Q: Why are you running?

A: "I feel like we need to keep the city spending under control because from 1992 to 2001, the population only increased a little over 1,200 people and yet we added 59 more city employees. We didn't need one new city employee for every 20 new people. We obviously need to spend money to create more housing and sewers, but we don't need to have more people on payroll doing busy work."

Q: If elected, what are some issues you'll be facing?

A: "We'll be facing a shortage of funds from the state and the big thing I'm pushing for is to try to have a more efficient government. Nobody's in the mood to raise taxes. We need a more efficient way to get by without hiring a bunch more people."

Ed Klimek
Manhattan mayor and director of marketing and business development at Kansas State Bank

Q: Why are you running?

A: "The best reason I would like to be re-elected is because over the last two years, we have been very careful in our spending in the budget. What that has done is it has put the city of Manhattan in a relatively good condition despite the revenue shortfalls we're facing right now."

Q: If elected, what are some issues you'll be facing?

A: "Continuing to hold the line on spending. It's very important at this time and to try to stay away from tax increases if at all possible and continue efficiency of increasing the tax base of the city. Increasing the tax base isn't a tax increase. It's a tax increase by growth in retail business and housing sectors.

Pamela Wilkie
K-State assistant director of affirmative action

Q: Why are you running for City Commission?

A: "I'm running for City Commission basically because when you live in a community, you need to give back to it. And I feel like with my experience in life, I can bring something to the table. It's time to do my community service and try to be elected to this position."

Q: If elected, what issues will you be facing?

A: "Budget and trying to operate in constraints within budget, affordable housing in Manhattan and jobs into the city."

Bruce Snead
city commissioner and state extension specialist in energy and indoor air quality

Q: Why are you running?

A: "Because I want to continue to do what I can to sustain our community to help lead our community and be involved in the decisions that affect our quality in life. I feel my experience, knowledge and commitment will be beneficial in continuing to serve as a city commissioner."

Q: If elected, what are some issues you'll be facing?

A: "There are probably five issues in the coming two years that will be dealt with. The first is wise use of limited tax dollars to sustain essential services and community way of life. The second is the economic development to diversify the economy and create jobs. The third is finding a way to support our schools by enhancing opportunities for family housing. Number four is implementing the Land Use Plan to guide and manage growth. The last is redevelopment initiatives that can strengthen Manhattan as a regional center."

TO THE POINT

Voting should be priority for K-State students

Elections begin today, and it's our responsibility as a student body to get out and vote.

This year's candidates have a number of platforms that fit the needs of the university.

Candidates have expressed interests in both academic and campus-life affairs.

They have spoken about how they hope to improve the university's ongoing concerns with the budget crises. along with creating a Candidates have also proposed a number of resources to meet students' needs, such as an online book exchange program, new groups to give students voice and changes to Dead Week at the end of the semester.

In addition, candidates have voiced their opinions on certain areas of student life, such as health and fitness, and have stressed improvements to bookings at Manhattan's entertainment venues.

The future of K-State is at stake these next two weeks, and students must make every vote count.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

In the words of the almighty Tyson: I broke my back.

Aren't middle-aged men not supposed to be living in sorority houses?

Red Wrangler Jeans: $50. Red sequin shirt: $165. Wearing a red wig and still losing the K-State Rodeo Queen Pageant: priceless.

Even Hitler had a girlfriend. Why can't I?

Is it cool that I have to wear a stocking cap and long underwear to bed because it's so cold in my house?

The Grammys were a complete travesty. How in the hell does Norah Jones beat out Ashanti? Come on.

Except for slavery, fascism, communism and Nazism, war never solved anything.

Help, my car is covered in cloud feces.

I wish my ex-girlfriend would give up calling me for Lent.

Listen up, administration. If you're going to make us go to class in these kinds of conditions, at least clear off the sidewalks so they're safe to walk on. Thanks.

Stefanie Shank, Scranton Goldwater? Give me a break.

I like snow.

Greeks rejoice. You can support live music once again. Pomeroy is back.

I am more ghetto than you think.

I will have your oysters for dinner.

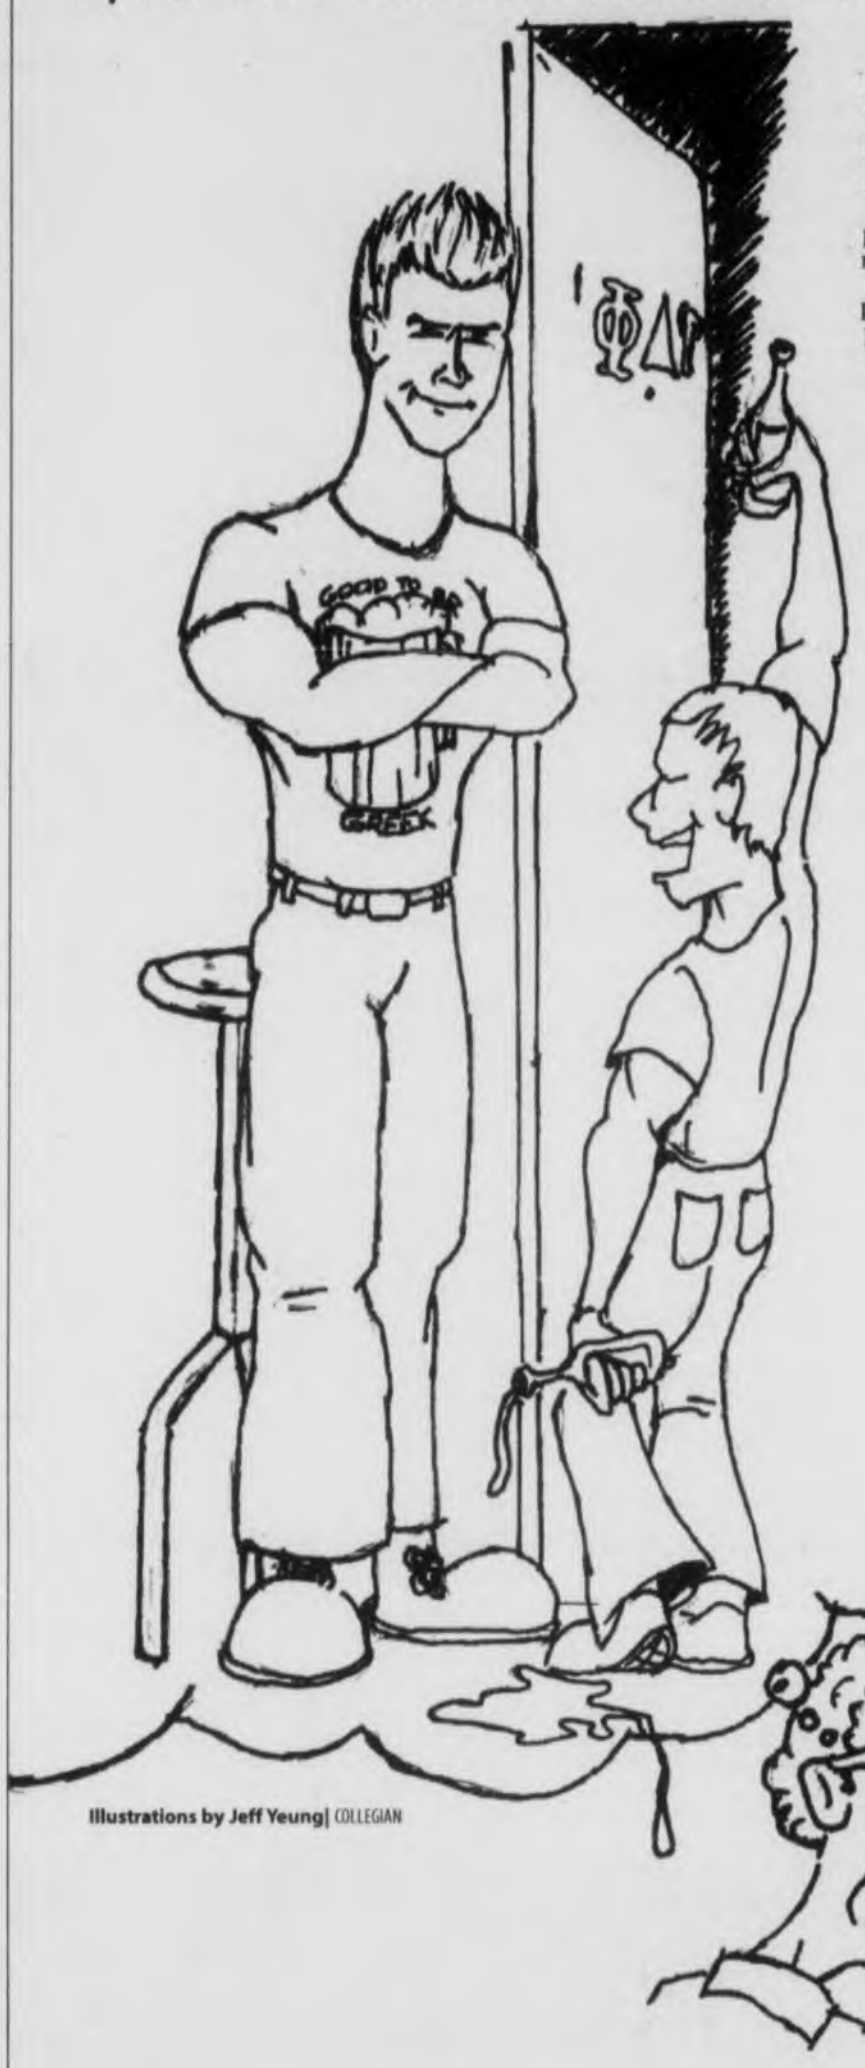
Yes, does anybody else hate Norah Jones?

All I have to say about KU basketball is lock, choke Jayhawk.

Both of my roommates have really squeaky bed springs.

Is it weird if your roommate calls herself a fruit?

It's really disgusting to watch people lay around and get fat.



I used to hate it when aunts and grandmas would come up to me at weddings and pinch my cheeks and say "Ooh, you're next." Yeah, they stopped doing that crap when I started doing it to them at funerals.

Hmm, a group of women talking about the vagina. I'm all over that.

THE GREEK MYTH

Myths about fraternities, sororities untrue, rarely seen in real situations

Illustrations by Jeff Yeung| COLLEGIAN

PAUL RESTIVO

I am in a fraternity.

I bought my friends because it was easier than trying to make friends on my own.

When I go out in public, I can't go without one of my fraternity brothers.

When I get dressed, I make sure I'm wearing something with my letters on it. If not, I'll at least wear flip-flops.

In a greek's world, fraternity business comes first, followed by academics. Fraternity grade point averages consistently rank below the all-campus GPA. Study programs don't even exist in the greek world. Rule of thumb: drink Natty Light before turning on the study light.

Our pledges undergo horrible treatment. Our weekly rituals are demeaning and emotionally torturous. Most of our rituals violate human rights codes. If a member cannot succumb to the tribulations of our ritual practices, he will be beaten with a paddle. By the time initiation rolls around, we have these boys whipped into shape. Only at this point are they worthy enough to be an equal of mine and earn my friendship.

Alcohol runs in our blood. Each night begins with a drinking game, usually followed by a pledge passing out on the floor. We laugh and pay him no attention. The weekends are no better. If we're not piss drunk, we're getting high with other greeks.

Our philanthropic events are only conducted as a public relations stunt to make the non-greeks think these stereotypes are untrue. We could care less about Up 'Til Dawn, the Children's Miracle Network, Multiple Sclerosis or battered women. We just care about making our name look good. And if we have to spend a few days a year suffering through such an event, so be it.

Little diversity exists in a greek's world. All of us think alike. We all have the same religious background. We all have the same political views. None of us have lived through a tragic experience. None of us have deceased parents.

Women are expendable. We find weekends as our opportunity to hook up with a willing freshman. Her body is our property once she's drunk. Condoms are useless. If I see a fraternity brother cheating on his girlfriend, I give him a high five.

There's nothing more to the greek life than parties. Our houses are designed with this in mind. If the cops didn't show up, it wasn't a successful party. If most of us didn't get laid, it wasn't a successful party. If I can remember what I did the previous night, it wasn't a successful party.

Our emotional connections with each other run thin. We are never there for each other during hard times. We do not cry in front of other brothers. We do not stay up hours into the night to get a brother through a difficult time in his life. We do not put other plans on hold if it means showing up during a time of need for a brother.

Once college is over, these friendships will finally end. Never again will I have a heart-to-heart with one of these so-called brothers. Neither will I bother to show up to a brother's funeral some day.

Finding the myths of fraternities is easier than finding the truths. In the preceding paragraphs, I have listed the myths. What are the facts of fraternities? That's a question no one asks before passing judgment about us. Why am I proud to be in a fraternity? Why are my fellow greeks proud to be greek? Ask us. Then make your judgment.

Confederate flag promotes ignorance; Georgia shouldn't display symbol

LINDSEY PRAECHTER

It makes me sick every time I see a Confederate flag displayed ignorantly on the front license plate of a truck here in Kansas. To think a state's flag could display that same symbol of slavery in front of any state building is even more nauseating.

The Georgia state flag that existed prior to 1956 featured a blue panel with the state crest and three stripes signifying the three pillars of wisdom, justice and moderation. In 1956, the three pillars were discarded and the Confederate Battle Emblem Flag was constructed. It flew until 2001 when former Gov. Roy Barnes changed the flag to its current design with a very small rendering of all of the Georgia flags at the bottom.

The new governor, Sonny Perdue, has rekindled the controversy when he said that he wants Georgia voters to settle the issue in a vote in March 2004. They will be able to choose between the flag flown before 1956 or the one featuring the Confederate symbol.

The referendum results would be non-binding, leaving it up to the legislature and governor's signatures to change the flag. But State Senate President Pro Tempore Eric Johnson said the vote will probably be followed through by the legislators.

"The political pressure will be tremendous on the general assembly to implement whatever voters select as their preferred state flag," Johnson said.

Supporters of the flag that features the Confederate emblem say it represents southern heritage and states' rights. Both of these claims are just excuses.

Southern heritage should not be thought of as a time of slavery and segregation. The south is rich in history and can be defined in better ways. It has been uniquely influenced by many cultures, most prominently by African-Americans, and shouldn't be defined by the Confederates alone.

I don't understand how anyone could be proud of a heritage that they would define under Confederate standards of abuse and intolerance anyway.

I cannot deny that a state's rights are imperative to the democratic government by which we abide. But shouldn't a state's government represent the best interest of all of its citizens? I would guess that any African-American in Georgia would prefer the flag without the Confederate symbol. I would also dare to guess that an overwhelming majority of Americans would prefer the flag without the Confederate symbol, too.

A symbol of oppression and slavery is not welcome as a state beacon. Confederates fought for the continuation of white supremacy and slavery in a country that is now seen as a melting pot of diverse cultures.

Celebrating southern heritage and a state's rights are fine, but the Civil War is over. That fate was decided and will never be overturned. Georgia and the rest of America doesn't live in a time of continuous reflection. We move to the future while still remembering and learning from our past.

This flag symbolizes a shameful time in our country's history when suffering was customary and accepted in day-to-day life. It is not wise to dwell on that. Americans should not look back and smile upon the Civil War.

Americans should understand that looking forward after learning about the past is essential to America's well-being.

Turkey allows U.S. troops to occupy

By Louis Meixler
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANKARA, Turkey – Turkey's Cabinet agreed Monday to host tens of thousands of U.S. combat troops for a possible Iraq war, a crucial step in realizing an American strategy that calls for a two-front attack that would surround and divide the forces of Saddam Hussein.

Foreign Minister Yasar Yakis said Turkish and U.S. officials are still negotiating the agreement and that a vote by parliament – which could come as early as Tuesday – could be delayed until the terms are finalized.

Washington has been pressing Turkey to approve the deployment. U.S. ships are waiting off the coast of Turkey to unload supplies for the 4th Infantry Division, which would lead an armored thrust from Turkey into northern Iraq if there is a war.

There was no immediate information on how many troops the Cabinet had agreed to allow into the country. Officials said that issue was being negotiated.

Turkey's public is overwhelmingly against a war and there has been strong opposition among legislators to allowing U.S. troops to use their territory to launch an attack.

However, the deputy chairman of the Justice and Development Party, which has a large majority in parliament, said he expected parliamentary approval.

"There will not be a problem," legislator Reha Denemec told The Associated Press. "The government approves it."

In Washington, White House spokesman Ari Fleischer welcomed the Cabinet's move.

"We're pleased by the actions taken by the government of Turkey to date," he said. "There are still some t's to be crossed and i's to be dotted."

A Western diplomat said talks between the two sides on the details of the agreement were expected to continue until late Monday and possibly early Tuesday.

"Negotiations (with the United States) to reach an agreement on the military, political and economic issues have reached an important stage," Deputy Prime Minister Abdullatif Sener said. "However, they are still continuing. But to have kept the process any longer would not have been very healthy, therefore it was decided to send the authorization to parliament today."

Sener said that many ministers had reservations, but "in the end, the ministers unanimously endorsed to send it to parliament."

The Cabinet motion calls on parliament to allow the deployment of U.S. troops and authorize Turkish soldiers to enter Iraq.

The negotiating deadlock was broken late last week, when Washington offered Turkey $5 billion in aid and $10 billion in loans to cushion the Turkish economy from the effects of war, diplomats said.

Washington wants to use Turkey to open a northern front in a war in Iraq, a strategy that would divide the Iraqi army between an armored attack in the north and a thrust from the Persian Gulf.

Tens of thousands of Turkish troops are expected to cross into northern Iraq if there is a war, a plan that is raising tensions with Iraqi Kurds who control an autonomous zone in the north of the country.

The Turkish military on Sunday and Monday increased its forces along the border, sending in more soldiers, artillery and armored personnel carriers.

Turkey fears that Iraq could fragment if there is a war, with Kurds declaring an independent state. That, Turks fears, could encourage Turkey's Kurdish minority.

Panel accepts change to open meetings act

By John Hanna
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA, Kan. – A bill endorsed by a House committee Monday would require advisory committees and task forces created by incoming governors to have open meetings.

The measure was inspired by criticism of a "top to bottom" review of state government initiated by Gov. Kathleen Sebelius after her election last November.

Five teams appointed by Sebelius held 18 closed meetings before she took office in January.

The House Ethics and Elections Committee endorsed the bill on voice vote, sending it to the House floor for debate.

The bill originally applied to any task force or advisory committee created at the state or local level by an official or someone who has just been elected.

But a subcommittee recommended limiting the bill's provisions to groups appointed by an incoming governor. The League of Kansas Municipalities objected to having local governments included in the bill.

"It was pretty all-encompassing," said committee Chairman Don Myers, R-Derby. "It's a lot more palatable than it was."

Myers said he expects the House to pass the bill easily. Sebelius has said she will sign the bill if legislators send it to her.

Under the bill, advisory panels, task forces and commissions appointed following the election of the incoming governor would be subject to the Kansas Open Meetings Act.

Student government encourages home inspections before leases

Students will have the opportunity to make sure their new residence is up to par as they sign leases for next fall.

This week at the K-State Student Union, the Student Governing Association will be encouraging students to have their future homes inspected before moving in as part of Safe Housing Week.

Many students don't know that the city of Manhattan has a free house and apartment inspection policy, said Jason Heaser, vice-chair of the Student Affairs and Social Services Committee.

"Say you're looking to rent somewhere, an old house, and you're not sure if the building is up to code. Call Code Services, and they will come by and inspect it for you for free," he said.

"And they will even let the landlord know."

Students can stop by the booth across from the Union Food Court between 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. this week to pick up free pamphlets, which provide information about the inspections and city codes.

Today, Brad Claussen, building supervisor for the city of Manhattan, will be at the booth from 11:30 a.m. until 2 p.m.

Heaser said Claussen will discuss the inspections more in-depth – what they'll do and for what they'll be looking.

"He will also allow students to sign up for inspection times," he said.

Eleri Griffin, chair of the Student Affairs and Social Services Committee, said the inspectors will check the positioning of fire alarms in houses.

"Fire is a common problem in a lot of houses," she said. "It can happen on a regular basis. But there are other things they will check for, too."

Griffin said inspectors probably also will check to make sure there are not a lot of combustible items around.

"I want to encourage students to go and check out the information we're providing, even if you're living in the dorms or in greek housing," she said.

At some point, all students will need to pay for their own housing, Griffin said, but if they get the information now, it will save time and hassles in the future.

"They'll know the right questions to ask," she said.

Sarah Laib, freshman in political science, said she will take advantage of the free offer because she is moving off campus in the fall.

"I definitely will be contacting Code Services," she said.

Like many students, Laib was unaware of the offer until she received information from the booth. She said she thinks it is becoming more publicized, though.

"I think this is a great way to make students aware of what it takes to live off campus – some of the necessities people need to take care of before they move in," Laib said.

Heaser said he wants students to visit the booth before signing any leases.

"I encourage students to either get in contact with Code Services or stop by the booth. Don't sign a contract until you've had your house or apartment inspected," he said.

Heaser said he came up with the idea to alert students after reading through old legislation.

Students have had a booth similar to this one, he said, but it has not been done within the past five years.

"Thankfully everyone agreed with me that we should do it," he said.

"There is no cost to inform the students because the pamphlets have been provided through OSAS and Code Services through the fire department," Heaser said. "There is no cost to students or to SGA at all."

Griffin said she feels it is the responsibility of SGA to keep students informed.

"SGA is a servant of the student body. We want to really help educate students of their rights as renters," she said.

"We want to bring the information out for students."

Congress votes to increase Pell Grants

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student grants will not be affected as much as earlier proposed.

According to the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrator's Web site, Congress voted to increase the maximum Pell Grant award from $4,000 to $4,050 – $50 short of the original proposal.

There is a potential deficit of as much as $2 billion for Pell Grants because more students met the eligibility requirements than expected. To counter this deficit, the bill is providing $576 million more than President Bush's proposed amount.

Right now at K-State, about 25 percent of undergraduates – 4,743 students – receive Pell Grants, totaling more than $10.6 million. About 2,000 students also receive Perkins loans, and 1,000 receive the Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant, all of which are funded by the Department of Education, said Larry Moeder, director of the Offices of Admissions and Student Financial Assistance.

"The Pell Grant, Perkins Loans and Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants are not for everyone," he said. "They are only available to those students with the highest financial need, which is why they are so important."

The more grants students can receive, the better off they are, Moeder said.

"If students are not able to get as much grant assistance, they will be forced to borrow more money, and therefore leaving them with a larger debt once they get out of college," he said.

Moeder said K-State is better off than it could have been.

"I think it's good news that, with today's economy, we won't see drastic cuts in student-aid dollars.

"However, I think students still need more assistance, especially from grant programs," he said.

"All increases are going to be appreciated by students, but the government is still not keeping up with the rising cost of educational expenses."

Men's team likely to split final 4 games

Four games remain in the K-State men's conference basketball schedule.

For the Cats, that means four more chances to posture for a Big 12 Tournament position.

Although unlikely, the Cats could surge to the No. 7 seed with a miraculous undefeated run through their remaining contests and a catastrophic finish for the four teams ranked ahead of K-State.

DAN SMITH

More likely, though, is a mediocre stretch run that would leave Coach Jim Wooldridge's club in the bottom half of the Big 12 standings.

The first of those four games comes tonight in Lincoln, Neb.

The cliché "throw the records out when these two meet" comes to mind.

Losers of nine straight conference games, the Huskers represent K-State's best opportunity for a win the rest of the season.

Then again, when the Cats leave the city limits, there's no telling what might happen. K-State has lost 14 straight conference road games, including an 0-6 showing this season.

Nebraska hasn't been much better. The Huskers own just one league win at home this season, and K-State won the season's first meeting 77-53.

The game becomes all the more important when analyzing the rest of the Cats' schedule.

Wooldridge's crew follows up tonight's contest with a home game against Missouri on Saturday. K-State's first impression of the Tigers wasn't a favorable one.

MU's Arthur Johnson was the stud in that contest, burning K-State for 14 points and 17 rebounds.

At least the Tigers will have to make the trip to Bramlage, though. MU is just 1-5 away from the Hearnes Center during conference play, while the Cats own a 3-3 record inside the purple palace.

K-State then travels to Austin, Texas, on March 4 for its second-straight Tuesday game against the No. 3/4 Longhorns.

Texas has been close to unstoppable this season, so counting on a road win against the Horns isn't the wisest of ideas.

A rematch with Iowa State caps the Cats' season. K-State most likely will entertain the Cyclones on March 8 with a seed on the line.

After the Wildcats' second-half collapse in Ames on Saturday to hand over the league's 10th spot to Iowa State, Wooldridge should have his troops riled up to play this one.

A four-game Cat winning streak to end the season isn't the most likely of occurrences, especially with half of those games

Wildcats in need of road win against Huskers; Wooldridge looks for 1st win in Nebraska arena

K-State is on the road again.

But unlike Willie Nelson, the Wildcats would be just fine with not leaving home sweet home, where wins have come a little easier, and the people have been a bit more friendly.

Nevertheless, K-State is on the road again, and it needs a win.

"It's interesting, but I think they're ready to go again," Coach Jim Wooldridge said of his team on Monday's Big 12 teleconference. "I think they're ready to play and want to play and feel like they continue to play for something.

"That's been their approach throughout the year. They're wanting to get back on the winning trail, so their attitude is good."

K-State (12-13, 3-9) added to its season-long saga of close road losses Saturday when it dropped a 3-point decision to Iowa State in Ames, Iowa.

Now the Wildcats travel to Lincoln, Neb., tonight to play Nebraska (9-16, 1-11), a team that has a lot in common with K-State, Wooldridge said.

"They're like us, struggling to score the ball," he said. "They've put together quality minutes, but not enough throughout the game to get the win. But they have guys on their team, the Nate Johnsons,

Ellis strives for better shooting game

Guard looks to improve on personal accolades, encourages team spirit

Tim Ellis wasn't supposed to be a Wildcat.

While he was finishing up his career at the College of Southern Idaho, K-State had signed a full slate of athletes and was out of scholarships to give.

But an odd twist left one scholarship open and a Wildcat club in desperate need of guards.

That was a year ago.

Ellis came to Manhattan as the fourth component of a heralded recruiting class and as one of three guards expected to contribute immediately.

Still, he had yet to touch a basketball on a Division-1 court.

That was four months ago.

Now Ellis is a starting guard for K-State. He is the fourth scorer on the Cats' team and the No. 14 3-point shooter in the Big 12 Conference.

It has been a long trip, he said.

"I came a long ways," he said. "Getting set to playing Division-1 basketball is as much about the mental aspects as it is the physical ones. You have to be strong mentally, too."

The highlight of Ellis' season boiled down to one-tenth of a second at the end of a game on Feb. 1.

As time wound down, point guard Frank Richards fed Ellis the ball on the wing. He grabbed, fired and tied the game with the then No. 6 Oklahoma Sooners.

Ellis' shot has proven to be the pinnacle of a roller-coaster season for K-State. The Cats went on to lose in overtime and then lost five of their next six games.

Even Ellis hit a dry spell after OU. His shooting percentage over the last four games is 30 percent, down from his 46.3 percent on the season. He has made only two of his last 15 3-pointers, but he is still shooting 39 percent on the year.

The team's drought hasn't been lost on its players, Ellis said.

"We just have to finish games. This is disappointing," he said. "We can't pick and choose when to play. We have to come out of the gate hard, play that way for the whole

K-State held the first-round lead with a 306, but managed only a 312 in the second 18 holes to drop into a three-way tie for second place at the Central District Invitational in Parrish, Fla.

Wildcat junior Christine Boucher (75-75-150) is in a five-way tie for fourth place individually, one stroke behind Baylor's top tandem of Melanie Hagewood (72-77-149) and Hanna S. Svenningsson (75-74-149) and Ohio State's Kristen White (77-72-149).

Play begins at 8 this morning at the par-72, 6,099-yard River Wilderness Golf Club.

Men 4th in San Antonio

Play was suspended at yesterday's Roadrunner Invitational at Oak Hills Country Club in San Antonio, Texas, shortening the tournament from 54 to 36 holes.

Wintery conditions were enough for tournament officials to postpone the event midway through the second round. Scores were tallied, and play will resume today with golfers finishing up their last eight-to-nine holes.

The Cats finished the rain-shortened day in a tie for third place with an 18-hole score of 305, five strokes behind first-place Texas Tech. Arkansas is three shots ahead of K-State in second place.

Junior Aaron Watkins led K-State with a 2-over-par score of 73, just one stroke behind leader Zach Atkinson of North Texas who finished with a 72.

Coach Tim Norris said conditions were less than favorable.

"Conditions today were pretty brutal," Norris said. "Temperatures were in the low 40s, and there were 15-mph winds. It was not a good day to play golf."

Playing in his first tournament this spring after suffering a finger injury, A.J. Elgert finished the day with a 4-over 75. Norris said he was pleased with the junior's performance.

"It was not an easy day, and it was his first tournament since the end of October," Norris said. "I was very happy with the way he played, and he's going to continue to get better and better through the spring."

Norris also said he was

Women's basketball | Ohlde honored

Junior center Nicole Ohlde was named the Big 12 Conference Player of the Week for the third time this season, the league office announced Monday.

After averaging 19.5 points, 12.5 rebounds, 3.0 assists and 35 minutes per game last week, Ohlde became the only player in K-State history to earn the award three times in the same season.

Sophomore Kendra Wecker has won the award twice this season. Iowa State's Lindsey Wilson is the only other Big 12 player to earn the award more than once this season.

FLIRTING ON THE JOB

Dating coworkers can be beneficial, awkward

Photo illustration by Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN

By Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite ill feelings toward the boss or the job, there still might be a reason to go to work.

Spending time at work can be easier when you are with someone you care about and you enjoy each other's company, Josh Mathews, senior in computer engineering, said. However, when you start dating someone at work, it can be awkward, he said.

"I met my girlfriend at work, and we worked for about three months before we started dating," Mathews said. "We didn't tell a lot of people, and about a week went by before we told anybody. Our manager knows and really hasn't said anything about it."

While some businesses have policies on dating in the workplace, others have a more laid-back stance on dating.

Varney's Book Store doesn't have a policy on employees dating each other, Jeff Levin, store manager, said.

"We don't have a written policy on dating," Levin said. "We understand and know that we have several part-time employees that might share common interests.

"So, all that we say is to not do anything that will make other employees uncomfortable, like on-job affection. And, of course, a manager dating an employee will create a conflict of interest."

Being at work all day with a person can give people a chance to get to know someone better than a classroom setting, Levin said.

He said most of his employees are friends, and sometimes those friendships can lead to something more.

"As an employee, you spend hours with people, and you can sort of test the waters to see if they want to date," Levin said. "The only problem with that is that every once in a while someone will keep persisting for a date. That's when we will step in and tell them to cease and desist'"

"We try to tell people to keep relationships private. Conflicts can arise if people start getting uncomfortable. I don't want to become a manager of dating."

Jeff Levin
STORE MANAGER OF VARNEY'S BOOK STORE

K-State also has no written policy on dating in the workplace, Gary Leitnaker, director of human resources, said. He said that even though there is no policy, situational problems can still occur.

"We know that some employees do date," Leitnaker said. "But a problem can arise sometimes because there can be the perception of sexual harassment. It can really become a problem if the relationship goes south."

First Bank has no policy against dating, said Debi Urbanek, human resource and marketing manager.

However they do have a policy against family members who work at the same place due to the fact that family business can interfere with work, she said.

"We've had no problems with employees dating," Urbanek said. "If at some point in time it becomes a problem, we'd make it a policy. But it can be a problem if they date and decide to marry, because then we'd have to ask one of them to work somewhere else.

"We're a family organization that likes to form good relationships, and dating is something that is going to happen and is hard to avoid."

The bottom line is that in most situations, your personal life shouldn't be involved in your work life, Levin said.

"We try to tell people to keep relationships private," Levin said. "Conflicts can arise if people start getting uncomfortable.

"We have husband/wife teams that work in different departments, which is fine. But I'm a full-time employee, and I don't want to become a manager of dating."

Band returns to hometown Manhattan for live show tonight

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Welcome back show
Who: Pomeroy with opening act Anything but Joey
When: 8 pm.
Where: Silverado Saloon

Pomeroy is coming back to play in Manhattan where it all started five years ago.

"It's like any band going back to their hometown – it's special. It's the birthplace of our band," David Fairbanks, vocalist and hand percussionist, said. "I spent the best five years of my life there."

Fairbanks said the biggest change for the band is the new keyboard player, Tyson Leslie.

"Our old keyboardist decided to move on," Fairbanks said. "It was very important we found a replacement. Keyboard is a really important part of our band for what we want to accomplish."

Leslie is playing in five bands in Kansas City, including the band Karma, Fairbanks said.

"We had some kind of connection with the band," Fairbanks said.

"Once you have been around awhile, you get to know everyone in your area. Their old keyboardist actually played a couple of shows with us, but it didn't work out, and that is how we met Tyson."

Fairbanks said Leslie really adds excitement to the band's shows.

"This will actually be quite different than other Pomeroy shows, just by changing a member of the band," he said.

"Tyson is good, but different. He brings a different element. He is light years different in terms of his style and the way he plays," he said.

Matt Marron, vocalist and guitar player of Pomeroy, said Leslie is very different than the previous keyboardist.

"His style is so very different," Marron said. "Our old keyboardist played mostly punk. He plays all kinds of music, including rock and metal. He also sings, which means we can now do three part melodies, and he plays guitar. He has changed our sound."

Leslie said he is excited to play with Pomeroy because they write their own music.

"The music is different. It is a new style for me," Leslie said. "I have played with cover bands for the last few years, so I absolutely love playing for a band that writes their own music."

Leslie said he cannot say if he will play only with Pomeroy in the future.

"Right now, I have some obligations to the band I currently play with and will have those obligations at least until May," Leslie said.

Pomeroy will be releasing a new album this spring called "Identity," Fairbanks said.

There will be six or seven new songs that the band has been working on for the past couple of years.

Fairbanks said when the band members first started, that they were all still in college and had different priorities.

He said their original sound was more of a rap and harder rock sound.

Now they have incorporated more of a funk sound-less rock with certain pop and hip-hop elements.

"I think it is a lot different," Fairbanks said. "We are really a fusion band."

The instrumentation and arrangements are more mature, and the sound on the new album is more live, Marron said.

"We will be playing all of the new songs, three of which I am positive have never been heard before in Manhattan," Marron said.

Judge refuses to dismiss charge against Pee Wee

A judge refused to dismiss a misdemeanor charge accusing Paul Reubens, the actor best known for playing Pee Wee Herman, of possessing child pornography.

Reubens has pleaded innocent to one misdemeanor count of possessing material depicting children under 18 engaging in sexual conduct.

The charge, which carries a maximum penalty of a year in jail and a $2,500 fine, resulted from a search of Reubens' home in November 2001.

Kraft has said police found a "massive" pornography collection consisting of photographs, magazines and hundreds of home videos and movies.

China rejects Powell's proposals on North Korea

By George Gedda
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEOUL, South Korea – Chinese officials rebuffed a U.S. proposal Monday for a regional coalition to pressure North Korea to end its nuclear weapons program and told Secretary of State Colin Powell that direct talks between the United States and North Korea hold the best hope for resolving the dispute.

After his talks in Beijing, Powell flew to South Korea for Tuesday's inauguration of President-elect Roh Moo-hyun, also an advocate of U.S. negotiations with North Korea.

Roh, who favors reconciliation with Pyongyang, also says he would not support any U.S. plan to attack North Korea.

On Tuesday, Powell is expected to announce a major donation of U.S. food to the North Korean people, many of whom are believed to suffer severe famine-induced malnutrition.

North Korea and Iraq dominated separate meetings Powell held with Chinese Foreign Minister Tang Jiaxuan, Vice President Hu Jintao and President Jiang Zemin.

The discussions on Iraq were inconclusive. China favors continued U.N. inspections in Iraq as opposed to a second U.N. Security Council resolution that would authorize military action should Iraq refuse to disarm.

The United States and Britain are to propose the resolution on Tuesday.

Left unclear from Powell's talks in Beijing was whether China would veto a second resolution if it should come to a council vote.

On North Korea, Powell has pushed for a multilateral effort to dismantle Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program for weeks, with scant results.

At a news conference Monday, the American representative said the North Korean weapons issue "is a matter for China, it's a matter for South Korea, it's a matter for Japan, it's a matter for Russia, and it's a matter for the United Nations."

He added that the United States feels strongly that "North Korea's actions pose a threat to regional stability and to the global nonproliferation regime."

Chinese state television quoted Tang, the foreign minister, as saying that China hopes for talks on the nuclear issue between the United States and North Korea "on an equal basis."

The Chinese state news agency Xinhua, meanwhile, reported that Vice President Hu made the same point and said U.S. talks with North Korea should begin soon.

North Korea itself has long advocated direct discussions with Washington that would lead to a nonaggression treaty.

Powell has said direct talks in 1994 resulted in a promise by Pyongyang to forgo nuclear weapons, which he said the communist government has since violated.

Only much broader international participation has a chance of producing a satisfactory outcome, he has said.

U.S. government analysts fear that North Korea, left unchecked, could have six plutonium-based nuclear weapons in a few months, possibly leading to a destabilizing regional arms race.

Among countries in the area, only Japan has sided with the United States in its call for international negotiations.

China says it favors a nuclear-free Korean Peninsula, but U.S. officials complain that Beijing has done little to achieve that objective.

55 people indicted for illegal drug trafficking

By Curt Anderson
ASSOCIATED PRESS

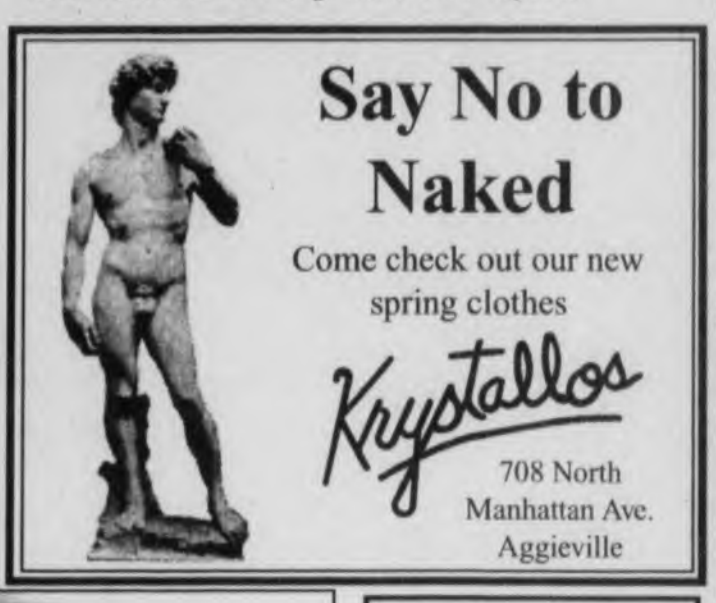
WASHINGTON – Federal authorities charged 55 people Monday with trafficking in illegal drug paraphernalia.

Three dozen people were charged Monday with trafficking illegal drug paraphernalia, using both traditional stores and the Internet.

A federal grand jury in Pennsylvania handed up indictments against 27 people as part of an investigation stretching from Pittsburgh to Phoenix to southern California, Attorney General John Ashcroft said.

Another nine people were charged in four grand jury indictments returned in Des Moines, Iowa, under "Operation Headhunter."

The investigation involved paraphernalia marketed by distributors in Michigan, California and Texas.



In all, 55 people were named in nearly three dozen indictments.

Federal law makes it a crime to sell products mainly intended for the use of illegal drugs.

Those charged with selling and conspiring to sell face up to three years on prison and maximum fines of $250,000.

A search warrant in the Iowa case turned up more than $2 million in illegal paraphernalia, authorities said.

reactivating their accounts. All that is required is the student's last name, social security number and birth date.

Students are required by the information technology security policy to change their passwords each semester, Gould said. The rule is in place for security reasons, she said.

Elections chair Mark Threeton said this rule was seen as a potential barrier for students who want to vote.

Candidates were informed of the rule so they could encourage students to make the necessary changes, Threeton said.

Harlan said the password change has been a concern, and doesn't want the rule to be an obstacle that keeps students from voting.

"We don't want students to feel they're being left out," Harlan said, "especially when it's such a simple process."

VOTING | Primary election today

candidate Matt Wolters won. A re-vote was scheduled, and Zac Cook won the presidency.

Harlan said the new system should eliminate problems experienced in last year's elections.

"It's a little easier to read and follow," Harlan said of the new ballot.

"It's worth the money we're spending on it."

The cost of the new balloting system is less than going through an outside vendor such as iBallot.com, Harlan said.

Mock elections have been used to test the new system, Threeton said, and results have come back quickly and accurately.

"We're looking forward to the election running smoothly," Threeton said.

Threeton said the primary election may present more of a challenge for the new system than the March 4-5 general elections because he expects more students to vote in the primary election.

Threeton said national statistics for voter participation in student government elections found only about 10 percent of students will vote in the general elections, "which is pretty sad," he said.

But because the primary election has more presidential candidates, Threeton said he expects it to draw a larger crowd – but anything is possible.

"It just comes down to candidate interest," he said, "and how many people they can reach.

"It could prove me wrong."

Students can log onto www.sgaelections.k-state.edu between 8 a.m. today and 6 p.m. Wednesday to vote in the presidential primary election.

Federal judge rejects lawsuit barring Bush

By Justin Pope
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON – A federal judge on Monday threw out a lawsuit that raised constitutional concerns in seeking an injunction to bar President Bush from launching war against Iraq.

The lawsuit, filed earlier this month by six Democrats and three unidentified service members and their parents, maintained that only Congress has the constitutional authority to declare war.

The plaintiffs argued that the resolution Congress approved in October supporting military action against Iraq did not specifically declare war and unlawfully ceded the decision to President Bush. One of the plaintiffs, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., cited a passage of the U.S. Constitution: "Congress shall have power ... to declare war."

However, U.S. District Judge Joseph Tauro ruled Monday that the court did not have jurisdiction to issue an injunction against Bush.

Tauro said the lawsuit engaged "political questions in the legal sense that are beyond the jurisdiction of the court."

The judge said he could not find evidence of any conflict between the will of the executive and legislative branches.

"Case law makes clear that the Congress does not have the exclusive right to determine whether or not the United States engages in war," he said.

KEY GAMES | Cats must look for opportunities to finish well away from Bramlage.

A 3-1 prediction even requires positive thinking, considering K-State's horrible road mark in league games.

Which means the Cats' most likely record come tournament time will be 14-15, with a 5-11 conference mark. That scenario would play out if K-State manages to go .500 the rest of the season.

The opportunities are there for a good finish and momentum heading into the tournament.

And Wooldridge knows as well as anyone how much seeding can determine a team's destiny in any tournament.

Dan is a senior in print journalism. You can e-mail him at dansmith@k-state.edu.

ROAD | Possible lineup changes may improve chances for victory

that are capable of having big nights."

Johnson leads the struggling Huskers in scoring, averaging 13.3 points per game. He scored 13 to lead Nebraska against the Wildcats back on Jan. 22, a game K-State won 77-53.

Nebraska has dropped nine straight in conference play. The Huskers' last win came back on Jan. 18 against Colorado.

Winning in Lincoln, however, has not been easy for Wooldridge and the Wildcats.

K-State's coach has never won in the Devaney Center. Last season, the Wildcats lost by 17.

Tonight might be different, though. On the teleconference, Wooldridge eluded to the possibility of changing the starting lineup. He said senior Quentin Buchanan might get the nod in an effort to win the size advantage. Another possibility, he said, is changing to a true three-guard lineup and inserting Jarrett Hart.

Wooldridge said the decision would be made after Monday's practice.

"We'll think all this through and then we might just stay the way we have been," he said. "We'll look at different combinations of players and go with it."

But changes to the Wildcat lineup shouldn't affect senior forward Pervis Pasco, who had been struggling as of late.

Pasco broke out of his slump Saturday against the Cyclones, when he poured in 15 points and grabbed 10 rebounds.

Wooldridge said he was impressed with Pasco's play despite a nagging knee problem.

"With Pervis, when he's playing active, good things happen," he said. "People have been real physical with him, and I think it's bothered him a little bit. But you saw in the Iowa State game, he played through it."

With two road games remaining, K-State is forced to win one if it hopes to still be eligible for the postseason NIT tournament.

With two struggling offenses, this game may come down to who can execute the best, Wooldridge said.

"We've talked about this all year, but for our team to play well, we need to maintain balance," he said. "Right now, we are not finding much balance on the offensive end."

ELLIS | Guard emphasizes need for team to work together for win

game and finish that way.

"Everybody's attitude is changing a little bit. Their demeanor is different. They just want to come out and play hard now."

Attitude and demeanor can only go so far, though.

With losses piling up and the team's preseason goals slipping further away, Ellis said the team has to come together rather than fall apart.

By playing as a team, Ellis said, some aspirations are still attainable.

"We can still accomplish goals" he said.

"We just want to win, play hard and play together. There can't be any finger-pointing on the team."

The Cats only have four more chances to play together this regular season.

Two of those games come against ranked opponents, and two are on the road. But that doesn't have them down, Ellis said.

He said the team that everyone saw go punch-for-punch with OU, the team that flattened Texas Tech and the team that already has won 12 games this season will still come to play tonight against Nebraska.

There are still opportunities. Ellis said he won't let his shot against the Sooners be the highlight of this season.

"There are still some big games out there," he said.

"We can get those. You still know you're a good ball club even though some people may judge you."

pleased with the play of his two freshman, Ben Kern and Josh Persons. Persons, who had played the course before during the U.S. Junior Amateur, fired a 5-over 76 yesterday.

"I think Ben had a couple of tough holes," Norris said. "Josh played here before at the U.S. Junior Amateur two summers ago. He had some good and bad holes. Both of them are doing a fine job for us."

Norris said his team isn't new to bad weather but isn't looking for a repeat of yesterday's conditions.

"Hopefully we'll get a little better weather," Norris said. "These guys are not strangers to playing in less than ideal conditions. Hopefully the mental toughness and attitude are tested in conditions like these. I'm really happy with the way the guys battled through it because it was not easy."

Down only five strokes, Norris knows his team still has a shot at victory.

"I think it was just survival yesterday," Norris said. "We stayed close in the first round, and it's hard to say how we match up right now with nine holes to go. If we come out and play solid tomorrow, we've given ourselves a chance to win."

RESOLUTION | Powell asks China for support

British-Spanish plan.

Secretary of State Colin Powell urged China to support the new resolution, but the Chinese insist that U.N. inspections should continue.

The draft resolution does not set any deadlines. But U.S. and British officials made clear they want the Security Council to vote by mid-March.

The resolution says Iraq has failed to take advantage of its last chance to disarm peacefully and therefore must face the "serious consequences" the Security Council threatened in Resolution 1441, which was adopted unanimously on Nov. 8.

The new resolution recalls that "Iraq has been and remains in material breach of its obligations" under U.N. resolutions.

It also recalls that council decided on Nov. 8 "that false statements or omissions" in its 12,000-page declaration to U.N. weapons inspectors "and failure by Iraq at any time to comply with, and cooperate fully in the implementation of that resolution, would constitute a further material breach."

The resolution notes that the council has repeatedly warned Iraq "that it will face serious consequences as a result of its continued violations of its obligations." It also observes that Iraq's Dec. 7 weapons declaration contained "false statements and omissions."

The resolution acts under Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter, making it militarily enforceable. It does not call for "all necessary means" to be used against Iraq.

Instead, its only enforcement paragraph would have the Security Council decide "that Iraq has failed to take the final opportunity afforded to it in Resolution 1441."

French diplomats said the French-German-Russian plan, which includes strengthened U.N. weapons inspections, can be implemented under existing U.N. resolutions and would be submitted as a memorandum.

Thousands mourn victims of club fire

By Adam Gorlick
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WEST WARWICK, R.I. – Relatives, friends and coworkers of the 97 people who died in last week's nightclub fire gathered by the thousands at three memorial services Monday, seeking solace by exchanging stories and embraces.

"It's so sad, but so nice to see all these people come together," said Kim Ondrick, who attended a vigil at the West Warwick Civic Center with her friend, Sherry Lariviere.

Both worked at The Station, the club that burned to ashes in Thursday's fire, and went to the vigil after visiting the grim scene. "It doesn't seem real," Lariviere said. "We're still in shock."

Investigators focused Monday on whether the soundproofing material that burst into flames at the club was a highly flammable type that shouldn't have been installed in the first place. State law bars flammable acoustic material like polyurethane foam from the walls of gathering spaces like bars.

"If it was (polyurethane), then the governor's going want an answer to the question, 'Why was it there?'" said Gov. Don Carcieri's spokesman, Jeff Neal.

Monday's services were held as officials said all but 19 victims have been identified, and as the governor ordered state agencies to fly the Rhode Island state flag at half-staff. About 80 survivors remain hospitalized; about half were listed in critical condition.

The 2,000-seat West Warwick Civic Center was standing-room only, with people lining the walls to hear tributes to the victims.

"To the 97 victims who perished, take solace in the fact that you are now at rest and in peace," state Rep. Timothy Williamson said between sobs. "To the families, some of you have come to Warwick as strangers, you leave as our family. The suffering must be indescribable and to you I leave our love and our prayers."

Among the crowd were school bus drivers who had worked with Robert Reisner, 29, and drove his bus to the service. They remembered the rock 'n' roll fan fondly.

"There is no doubt in my mind that he was letting people out of the club in front of him," Danny Manns recalled. "He was a gentleman."

"This is a tragedy that will take years for our close-knit community to come to grips with," state House Speaker William Murphy told mourners.

The fire began during the first song of the night by the '80s band Great White. Pyrotechnics apparently set fire to soundproofing behind and above the stage, sending flames roaring through the club in a matter of minutes.

The state has started a criminal investigation into the fire, which also injured 180 people.

At a service at St. Gregory the Great Church in nearby Warwick, about 400 mourners sang hymns and prayed for victims. One pastor asked grieving families to hold up pictures of their lost relatives so mourners can "know for a moment those you loved."

"It's true that some good may come from this disaster, but the event itself is only tragic and will never make sense," said the Rev. John E. Holt of the Rhode Island Council of Churches. He saluted families for their "quiet courage."

"All the good people of Rhode Island, from Westerly to Woonsocket, are emotionally involved with you," he said. "They inquire of your welfare. We belong to each other. Most importantly, we know that God is emotionally involved. God weeps for you."

In Pawtucket, north of Providence near the Massachusetts line, about 400 people gathered for a service at St. Cecelia Church. The photographs of two victims who were from the area were placed at the altar.

Rebel group declares Americans 'prisoners of war'

By Susannah A. Nesmith
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOGOTA, Colombia – Colombian rebels declared Monday that three captured Americans were "prisoners of war" and will be freed only as part of a broad prisoner exchange with Colombian government.

The Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, known as the FARC, demanded a demilitarized zone from the Colombian government in order to exchange the three Americans and dozens of Colombian soldiers and police – who are also held by the rebels – for insurgents who are in Colombian prisons. The rebels posted their statement on their Internet site.

The three Americans were captured on Feb. 13 after their U.S. government plane went down in FARC territory. A fourth American and a Colombian were shot and killed near the scene of the crash. Colombian authorities announced Monday they had captured a suspect in the killings.

"The three gringo prisoners of war in the custody of our organization will be liberated along with other Colombian prisoners of war once an exchange materializes in a large demilitarized zone," the FARC said in its statement.

President Bush authorized the deployment of up to 150 more troops to Colombia to help in the search for the three Americans, U.S. Southern Command spokesman Art Merkel said Monday.

In Washington, U.S. officials again called for the release of the three.

"The FARC is responsible for the American crew members' safety, health and well-being," U.S. State Department spokeswoman Jo-Anne Prokopowicz said. "We have not authorized or requested any group to negotiate. We demand that the FARC immediately release the U.S. crew members."

The FARC said in its statement that the decision to send more troops to Colombia, was "a bald-faced invasion by the United States of our country."

Members of the Senate's foreign relations committee may call a special session to debate the deployment, said Jimmy Chamorro, vice president of the committee.

The constitution requires that the Senate authorize any U.S. deployment that involves offensive operations, Chamorro said.

U.S. officials said the additional troops would not be allowed to take on combat roles.

The U.S. government has not announced what specific mission the Americans were on when their plane went down over southern Colombia's Caqueta state. Officials said they were contractors with the Miami-based Southern Command. In a previous statement over the weekend, the FARC accused the three of being with the CIA.

Oleen arrested for DUI Tuesday

Senate Majority Leader fails sobriety tests

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Senate Majority Leader Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, was arrested for driving under the influence in Topeka early Tuesday.

Oleen failed both a sobriety test and Breathalyzer test, the Shawnee County Sheriff's Department said. A deputy stopped her at about 12:30 a.m. in southeast Topeka because her Jeep Cherokee wasn't staying in one lane of traffic.

Lana Oleen
SENATE MAJORITY LEADER

Oleen was released from the Shawnee County Jail on Tuesday morning after posting a $1,000 bond.

Oleen refused to comment, but said in a prepared statement that she regretted the incident.

"As a Kansas citizen, I am subject to the same rules and process as any other person," she said in the statement. "I intend to answer the charge against me.

"In the meantime, it is my intention to continue to diligently carry out my responsibilities in the senate as I always have."

Oleen has served as a representative since 1989 and as the majority leader since 2001.

Residents use substances despite hall policy

By Tristan Hinderliter and Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One K-State student who lives in the residence halls keeps a hidden cigar box with various drug paraphernalia in it. Along with a baggie of marijuana and a small green and black pipe, the box contains what appears to be something homemade.

"That there is a 'doob tube,'" the student explains. "It is a toilet paper roll stuffed with dryer sheets. You blow smoke through it and it absorbs the smell, and the smell of dryer sheets comes out the other end."

The student, who wished to be identified by the false name of Jack, is not alone in using drugs in the residence halls.

Elizabeth, a former occupant of the residence halls, also smoked marijuana in her room. She, too, referred to her "doob tube" when explaining how she got away with it.

"We put a towel under the door and cracked a window. We only did it for the first couple of weeks of school, though," she said. "People started complaining about the smell."

Officials are aware of the situation.

Capt. Robert Mellgren of K-State Police said drug use in the residence halls might happen, but it doesn't seem to be an overwhelming problem.

"We rely on self-patrol from the residence hall directors," he said. "We all know drugs are there, but right now it appears not to be a problem."

When it comes to dealing with residents caught with illegal substances, procedures are followed, just as would be done in any other type of residence setting, Mellgren said.

Residents have the right to refuse a search, and police have the right to go out and get a search warrant, he said.

"We will do what we need to do and follow the law," Mellgren said.

Elections running smoothly

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's new in-house voting system is working properly after the first day of primary elections, officials said.

Mark Threeton, elections chair, said late Tuesday afternoon there had not been any problems with the voting system. This is the first election using the program, but Threeton said there had been some mock elections prior to Tuesday to ensure the program would work properly.

However, officials are relying on voters to express their concerns with the system, said Bill Harlan, interim assistant director of Student Activities and Services.

To report any problems, Harlan said students can contact the Information Technology Assistance Center help desk

Student eliminated in city primary

The Manhattan City Commission primary election eliminated a K-State student from the race Tuesday night.

Danny Callahan, graduate student in the pre-health profession program, was the only candidate eliminated from the race with 5.47 percent in the primary election.

The six remaining candidates will proceed to the general city election on April 1, where three positions for city commission will be filled.

County Clerk Rich Vargo said there was a 13 percent voter turnout, which was higher than the last primary election,

Bruce Snead received the majority vote with 22.31 percent and said he was pleased.

"It's reassuring. It just means I have to keep working and be ready to move on to the general elections," Snead said. "I'm very pleased and honored the voters have sent the message to me that they want me to keep going."

The next highest votes were received by current Mayor Ed Klimek and Mark Hatesohl with 21.96 percent and 17.85 percent, respectively.

Linda Ray, Riley resident, congratulates Mark Hatesohl after hearing the final results of the city commission primary elections. Ray came to show her support for Hatesohl, who came in third with 17.85 percent of the votes.

"I think, with the two popular incumbents, running third is the best hope for me," Hatesohl said.

"It's the best I could do with a five-week campaign so far."

Marolyn Caldwell said she is very excited to have received the fourth most popular vote with 14.2 percent. She received 1,072 votes.

"I started as a real newcomer and this is wonderful," she said. "I might actually have a chance to do something for Manhattan. I'm glad that many people voted for me."

John Collinson, who received 8.96 percent of the vote, said he was less excited.

"I'm still in the race. I'm just going to have to work harder," he said. "I need to knock on more people's doors; I think I need to concentrate on the north side of

After a fire at a Rhode Island club killed 97 people and a Chicago nightclub stampede killed 21, Manhattan bars are taking precautions to prevent such tragedies from occurring.

Local owners are emphasizing the occupancy capacity to ensure public safety for area residents while visiting Aggieville.

Keith Eyestone, owner of the Purple Pig, said he has spoken with the doormen about being aware of the number of visitors are who within the bar at the same time.

"I've talked to my doormen about keeping an eye on the crowds and anything out of the ordinary," Eyestone said. "I've told them to make sure they are counting heads to make sure we are complying with our seating

The application review: Dana

Hi, everyone. Hope your fingers aren't frozen and your socks are dry.

Despite the cold temperatures outside, I've had nothing but warm reception for my desire to "play around" and look for a new Page 2 partner.

So far, I've not strayed far. Last week's interview with a certain Micah Hawkinson left me wanting to wash my hands – with a Brillo pad.

But I received this bio from the Collegian's very own sports editor. It seems Smith here thinks he can fill my long-haired buddy's shoes.

He might have to try growing some hair first, or else we'll have to call this column "Baldy and Bellow." I reviewed his stats anyway. Everyone deserves a chance, even short bald guys with dimples.

Question:
Who will the temporary banterer be?
Banterer Layton Ehmke is on hiatus to pursue political office. You can e-mail Banter and Bellow columnist Dana Strongin, junior in print journalism, at banter@spub.k-state.edu

Smith's Collegian position worries me. Sports guys sometimes strut around like they belong on the starting lineup. But we all know why they're reporting on the plays, not making them, right, kids?

Hmm, both of his parents work for Hallmark. You'd think he'd be a little more sensitive. Look at how many women he's hit on, because 130 seems a little steep. Who keeps track of that stuff, anyway?

At least he can cook. Maybe I'd let him write a little sumpin' sumpin' after he cooks me a nice five-course meal. Me and 10 of my friends, of course, while he serves us in one of those mascot costumes he's always talking about.

Dan and I have similar going-out habits, but he seems like a bit of a pool shark. I'm no Jaws at the billiards table. I don't know if I could withstand his hours of cue play into the night.

I'm starting to get antsy. I started this journey in search of something special, and so far I've run into a home-schooled geek and a sports nut who could potentially steal my favorite nickname, "D."

Who will be worth the newsprint next week?

K-State's study-abroad program sets new participant record

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More students than ever before went overseas this spring.

K-State's study abroad program has set a new record for the semester. This semester, 206 students have traveled to various places around the world to study and learn about new cultures and languages, up 23 percent from spring 2002, Stephanie Springer, study abroad adviser, said.

She attributed the increase to word of mouth.

"Students are telling their friends and sharing what a great experience it is," she said. "This, combined with the increased number of advisers, are reflected in the numbers."

There are minimum requirements to study abroad, Springer said.

"K-State's requirements are 30 credit hours and at least a 2.5 GPA," she said.

Different programs have specific requirements that must be met as well, such as a higher grade point average, Staci Hauschild, study abroad adviser, said.

Students have many options of places to study, Hauschild said.

"Our three most popular places are Deakin University in Australia, Czech Ag, Czech Tech and Charles University in Prague, and Ronda, Spain," she said.

"Deakin University is popular because their campus is on the beach and they also have internship opportunities," Springer said.

"The Czech Republic is so popular because students can live like a king or queen. A full meal, drinks and dessert included, is four dollars. It gives an indication of how a student can live in Prague and really stretch their money."

Spain is popular because a lot of students want to increase their fluency in Spanish, but it's also one of the cheaper programs that is offered, Hauschild said.

"Students can go to school in a palace, live in the mountains and travel to the beach on the weekends," she said.

Cost varies for each program, Hauschild said, requiring anywhere from $1,000 a month to $20,000 per semester, depending on the program.

Most programs at K-State are about $6,000 per semester, which includes tuition, fees, room and board for a full credit load, Springer said.

Hauschild said K-State tries to make study abroad available to everyone.

Meeting time

General Study Abroad Meetings are from 2 to 3 p.m. on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays. Czech Republic is 4 to 5 p.m. on Tuesdays. Spanish Speaking Countries is 4 to 5 p.m. on Wednesday. Australia is 4 to 5 p.m. on Thursdays. All meetings are in Fairchild 304.

"A lot of the students that come in need financial aid, and cost is a factor," Hauschild said. "We try keep the cost as low as we can and to find them programs that are within their budget."

Mike Graff, senior in biology and anthropology with a secondary major in American ethnic studies, recently studied at Deakin. He said it was the best experience of his life.

"It's a great way to meet people and learn new social skills," he said. "You become open-minded to other people's beliefs and you realize that just because someone does something differently doesn't mean it's wrong. It's a great way to grow as a person."

Studying abroad is for all people, if they choose for it to be, Springer said.

"It's for those students that are open-minded and flexible and also for those students who want to become open-minded and flexible," she said. "It is for everybody, but they have to realize that it's going to be different than it is here at K-State."

If students are apprehensive about going alone, there is a group study program, Hauschild said.

"You can go and have a support system where you're with a majority of the same peers for the length of your stay," she said.

Hauschild said that heightened security and war issues have not prevented students from studying abroad.

"The programs that we send students on are safe. We make sure that they have a resident coordinator who acts as their advocate," Springer said. "This semester, we had to talk to students about safety issues, but they still chose to go.

"If anything, the war situation is making K-Staters aware that there's more out there than just Manhattan, Kansas. That's a great thing because they can be unofficial ambassadors for the United States."

Home Depot attracts new business, shoppers

New home improvement store brings competition, customers to Manhattan area

By Jessica Packard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Home Depot opened its doors to Manhattan residents in early January and as a result has brought competition to local home improvement stores.

Lyle Butler, president of the Chamber of Commerce, said the addition of Home Depot will help retain business in local Manhattan area as well as attract new business and shoppers.

Local home improvement stores said they have been somewhat affected by Home Depot's arrival.

Nick Thilges, manager for Mead Lumber Do-It Center, said business for all local stores will be affected by the economy, but not necessarily by Home Depot's success.

"It's affected our store a little bit, but not too disastrous," he said.

Thilges said that Mead gives its customers a different type of a shopping experience by helping the customers find products and loading items in their cars. He said he thinks it's the employees' attitudes toward the customers that makes the difference.

"By being a smaller company, the shopping experience is more personal for the customer," Thilges said.

Don Rice, store manager for Waters True Value Hardware, said business naturally slows down this time of the year.

"It's slow this time of the year, but I'm sure (Home Depot) affected us some," Rice said.

"It's another choice for customers but I don't think it has affected us tremendously."

Rice said he thinks business will pick back up in the spring and customers will want to visit Waters because of the knowledge the sales associates have.

"The employees here know a lot about our products and how to assist the customers," Rice said. "A lot of stores don't have that."

Butler said he thinks business for other area home improvement stores will not be affected in the long term by Home Depot.

"Any time there's a new business, everyone wants to check it out," Butler said.

"But once things settle down, other businesses will be all right."

Butler also said the economy in the local area has not been affected as much as other areas in Kansas, which allows residents to spend their money at a number of local businesses rather than just one.

"Manhattan's sales tax revenue continued to go up through November compared to last year," Butler said. "Whether that will continue only time will tell."

As for Home Depot, Brad Scholz, human resource manager, said the community has accepted the store's arrival.

"Business has been really good and Manhattan has welcomed us with open arms," he said.

In addition, Butler said the area near Home Depot will soon become a major shopping center in the region.

"New stores opening in Manhattan will bring more people to the area by helping our economy and creating new jobs for area residents," he said.

Safety a priority at local clubs after tragedy

In one week's time, 117 people died in two night clubs, one in West Warwick, R.I., and one in Chicago, reminding fans of the nightlife that they aren't immortal when they party.

Students who frequent bars and clubs in Manhattan should stay safe when they go out. In Chicago, the death toll climbed because one exit was allegedly blocked by security guards, as was reported in the Chicago Tribune Feb. 18.

In Rhode Island, authorities have cited a general ignorance of fire exits as one of the reasons for the high death toll.

Club-goers need to know the location of several exits wherever they decide to spend a night out.

Chicago Fire Department inspectors performed a round of surprise inspections last weekend and found 17 of the 25 inspected clubs to be in violation of at least one fire code. With odds like that, people need to consider the possibility that their favorite night clubs might not always be safe.

In the following weeks, blame for these tragedies will undoubtedly be passed around until those who are legally responsible are determined. But we still need to take responsiblity for our own safety as much as we can.

If pubic lice is wrong, then I don't want to be right.

Hey, a very wild woman once told me that life is a bowl of punch. So you've got to spike it.

I once saw my grandparents having sex. That's why I don't eat raisins anymore.

OK, so the Daily Kansan from KU has their sex column in the March issue of Cosmo. Hi, K-State needs to really get with the times. Come on, Collegian.

You want me to pay higher fees because you can't be a responsible drinker? Thanks, but no thanks.

Congratulations to Kelly Glasscock on a Pulitzer Prize picture. Great crotch shot of the cowboy in the K-State Rodeo spread.

First they hire Paul Restivo to rip off Paul White, and then they hire Scranton Goldwater to rip off that stupid comic last semester, "Fetus Genius." Good idea.

I took the road less traveled and got lost.

I spilled spot remover on my dog. Now he's gone.

I just want to say that the Ordinary Women's March isn't about using profanity. It's about standing up against violence against women.

I guess all the people at the rodeo this weekend forgot their pooper scoopers. Clean it up.

Wow, an entire article on duct tape. That's amazing.

Who calls out names while they're making out?

UNNECESSARY MADNESS

Safety, social issues top growing list of SUV criticism

MICAH HAWKINSON

Sport utility vehicles are essentially the worst ever.

The downsides of SUVs are obvious – they're dangerous, wasteful and unnecessary. In short, they seem designed to annoy the bodily excretions out of me.

According to the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, SUVs are 22 percent more likely to roll over in a fatal crash than most cars are. In addition, a 1999 study by the IIHS determined that most SUVs had insufficient head restraints, which equals a greater number of whiplash cases.

Ironically, a lot of folks buy SUVs for safety's sake, even though the vehicles are more likely to roll over in single-vehicle crashes. This causes a drastically increased injury potential, according to the Friends of the Earth SUV Web site www.suv.org.

Safety isn't the only issue with SUVs. They are among the worst gas-guzzlers on the automotive market today.

John DeCicco, senior fellow at Environmental Defense and co-author of "ACEEE's Green Book: The Environmental Guide to Cars & Trucks – Model Year 2003" writes that SUVs are a cause for concern because they "not only have high emissions and consume a lot of fuel, but also are sold in large numbers."

With gasoline prices climbing faster than a Swiss mountaineer being poked with red-hot lengths of rebar, driving an SUV is obviously bad for the ol' pocketbook.

And since the U.S. administration believes the best way to keep Saddam Hussein from giving terrorists weapons is to bomb the heck out of the people Hussein is oppressing, oil prices aren't likely to go down very soon.

More important than money, however, are all of those unnecessary fumes' effects on the environment.

I'm no hippie, but I think it is just plain dumb to use a mode of transportation that causes more pollution in the atmosphere than is absolutely necessary.

Nothing comes for free, and believe it or not, the extra gas you burn in your SUV today will probably translate into serious environmental problems for your grandchildren 50 years down the road.

Curiously, I find myself more annoyed by a third problem than I am by either SUVs' lack of safety or their ecological irresponsibility.

I am, of course, referring to the fact that almost no one who drives an SUV actually needs it – or even fits it.

It gives me an odd feeling to watch suburbanites who have never been offroad in their lives drive monstrous, 4-wheel-drive beasts down I-70 to their Johnson County homes. It's a little like the vibe I get when middle-class white boys bust out their acoustic guitars at parties and try to play the blues. It just isn't right.

SUVs can be useful if you actually need to go offroad or haul stuff around. But most people who own the monstrosities never do anything more adventurous than taking a trek with a passel of 11-year-olds to the local soccer field.

It boils down to social status. Maybe it's Freudian, or maybe it's just a fad – darned if I know.

The fact remains, however, that those who own SUVs have a position in society that differs greatly from the position of those who drive old, reliable station wagons.

A lot of people seem to need SUVs to feel valid as individuals. That's notwithstanding the vehicles' poor safety record and their economic and environmental problems, not to mention the fact that most people just can't use SUVs properly.

Those people's need for SUVs is, in short, sadder than a home-schooled kid at an underage keg party. And that, my friends, is extremely sad.

Arguments surrounding Iraq war based on fear

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

"Humpty Dumpty was spotted lying in grotesque pieces at the bottom of a menacing wall. Sources tell us all the king's horses and all the king's men couldn't put Humpty together again. The incident has not been linked to a terrorist attack. Police claim Humpty sustained his injuries by falling off the top of the wall. This has not yet been confirmed. We will bring you the in-depth story at 10 p.m. and tentatively blame the incident on Osama bin Laden, Saddam Hussein or an unknown 'terrorist.'

"This report just in – Americans should purchase curtains so that terrorist spies lurking in their suburban neighborhoods can't peer inside thier windows at thier helpless, defenseless children.

"Next we have 'Showdown with Iraq.' Stay tuned!"

We are living in a frightening and complex era. Whether you are a war protester, soldier, or average Joe, combating fear and ignorance is the key to a sane existence in a period of impending war and dire news reports.

Americans who support President Bush's march to war cite several reasons that Hussein and his regime should be eradicated. The acquisition of weapons of mass destruction, links with terrorist groups and the gross human rights abuses inflicted upon his people are the primary justifications supporters of the war assert. They believe it is America's responsibility to contend with a tyrannical dictator who is a considerable threat to the United States.

Staunch protesters of the war believe that political and economic gain are the primary causes of strife with Iraq. Questioning the Bush administration's motives, the anti-war community claims that oil and the interest of Israelis may be the true reasons behind war with Iraq. Also within this group are individuals who believe Hussein is a vile force to be dealt with, but believe that war is not the answer.

The Gallup Poll, found on PollingReport.com, conducted February 17-19, polled 1,002 adults. The question, "Would you favor or oppose invading Iraq with United States ground troops in an attempt to remove Saddam Hussein from power?" showed 59 percent were in favor and 38 percent were opposed. Three percent of those polled had no opinion.

The Gallup Poll alludes to an American inclination toward war. However, the question did not address when those polled would favor sending in ground troops. Do we give Hussein more time, or does the American public favor invading immediately? Secondly, what about the worldwide war protest?

Both groups present a plausible argument that is dominated by fear.

When peace protests and the threat of Iraq aren't dominating the headlines, the word "terrorist" and threats of attack occupy the ominous slot. The terror alerts being heightened to orange and red are meant to keep us on our toes and alert. However, when will we ignore those terror alerts like we ignore the whine of a car alarm? I believe this is already happening, and if and when a real threat is posed, it will be like the boy who cried wolf one too many times.

Our job is to sift through the abundance of information at our disposal, have an educated opinion, and live our lives. An American public living in fear and confusion defies the principle of everything we claim to vindicate.

Technology may be reason for increase in plagiarism

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Technology makes copying others' work easier than ever, officials say.

Twenty-nine of the 40 Honor Code violations during fall 2002 involved plagiarism, said Phil Anderson, director of K-State's Honor System.

"Plagiarism means stealing someone else's intellectual property without attribution," Anderson said.

Most of the cases involved downloading scholarly papers from the Internet, he said.

This statistic is similar to the results from a 2002 study conducted by Rochester Institute of Technology professors Patrick Scanlon and David Neumann. They surveyed about 800 college students from around the country and found that about 25 percent of the sample copied online text without citation.

They also reported that more than 50 percent of the surveyed students "suspected that their peers cut and pasted text from the Internet."

Even if the Internet helps students plagiarize, it also can help students get caught.

Anderson said the Internet makes it easy for faculty to detect plagiarism because they can simply visit a Web site and type in a few words or phrases.

"If the faculty have cause to believe the work they're reading is not the student's own work, it would be prudent for the faculty to check," he said.

Dean Hall, associate professor of English, said Internet programs are helpful in catching plagiarism.

"If you suspect plagiarism, there are many programs available. It's fairly easy to find the place where the original document came from," Hall said.

"We can also chat with the other professors within our departments to see if they've had similar assignments," he said.

Hall said it is more difficult to find plagiarism when the original source is not published.

The Honor Code came into effect in 1994 after a cheating scandal in a large lecture class made national news, Anderson said.

"This upset a lot of people. The provost formed a faculty and student committee to decide what to do about it," he said.

Anderson said he thinks the code has definitely raised awareness on campus.

"It is impossible to peer into people's souls to find out how much of an effect it has had," he said.

"Certainly the number of cases we receive continues to escalate. That is a result of students and faculty being more aware of the honor system. I'd like to believe the number of incidents has declined."

A U.S. News & World Report poll found that 90 percent of students believe cheaters are either never caught or have not been appropriately disciplined.

Molli Kimple, junior in kinesiology, said she agrees that people are more aware of the Honor Code because it is campuswide, and they may feel more comfortable reporting cheating incidents.

"People don't feel as guilty ratting out cheaters now. They can say they were just following the code," she said.

Kimple said an honor pledge will not necessarily change someone's character, but it is still a good idea to have one in place.

"Regardless, kids will do what they feel they need to do. They are who they are," Kimple said.

She said her physics professor requires students to write out the Honor Code on tests and sign their names to it as a reminder.

"You're hopefully saying your word means something by doing that," she said.

Hall said the English department has a similar requirement of having instructors inform students of the Honor Code.

"It's on the syllabus – what plagiarism is and how to avoid it. I tell students the proper way to document sources," he said.

It is important that students are aware of the code, Hall said.

"It makes good sense that students understand they have a role to play in being honest. We need to make sure they understand the consequences," he said.

Anderson said students who are not honest and do not write their own papers are violating the Honor Code.

"They're cheating themselves of an education," he said.

Career assessment program available to help students prepare future plans

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

University Counseling Services has added a new career assessment program to help with students' future decisions.

"Many students think of counseling as somewhere to go if they're having problems," Dan Wilcox, psychologist at Lafene Health Center, said.

"We want them to understand it's not just for when something is wrong. Students can do the assessment to find out about themselves in a number of ways."

For career assessment, two surveys can be taken, one of them consisting of two parts, Wilcox said. Strong Interest Inventory/Skills Assessment Inventory and the Myers-Briggs Type Indicator both are widely used and well-researched assessments.

"Interest inventory shows patterns in students' interests and how they link with the work world," Wilcox said.

After the Strong Interest Inventory, the second assessment that is taken is the Skills Assessment Inventory, he said.

"It measures how confident a student's skills are in performing specific tasks in six broad areas, as determined by their interest inventory results," he said.

The other survey, the Myers-Briggs Type Indicator, guides career and educational decisions, Wilcox said.

This is helpful in making choices about the future, Wilcox said.

"Students see what type of occupations people similar to them are attracted to," he said. "They may have never considered a particular job, but they might when they realize that is where their interests lie. They may also look into related fields."

For the overall testing, different options cater to individual needs of students, Wilcox said.

Students don't have to sit down and talk with counselor sbefore they take the tests, but they can if they want, he said. The assessments are then completed online.

The student may then choose to go over the results in scheduled group assessments, or individually with a counselor.

"I recommend individual follow-up with a career counselor," Wilcox said. "We offer three free sessions to students. They can come in for any reason – it doesn't have to be career-related."

Similar assessments are offered at the Academic and Career Information Center but focus solely on careers, said Michelle Haupt, coordinator of the Academic and Career Information Center.

"We offer two self-assessments that generate a list of majors and career paths," she said.

It's OK if students don't have a definite plan yet, Wilcox said.

"The kinds of thoughts students have and what they should be doing related to careers are very interesting," he said. "Many think they should have everything mapped out by now and that if they haven't, there is something wrong with them.

"Some students really stress about what direction they want to go. This is a good indicator to come in to take the assessments," he said.

KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY STUDENT GOVERNING ASSOCIATION
in conjunction with the Office of Student Activities and Services (OSAS)

This newsletter is an effort to inform you, the students of K-State, of the accomplishments and projects of your elected and appointed student officials. It is designed to give a brief overview of the major decisions of the past as well as to inform you of upcoming high-impact issues, so that you may voice your opinions to your respective representative in the Student Governing Association.

Past Projects

Safer Housing Week:
SGA and the City of Manhattan teamed up to inform renters about apartment safety and to schedule free safety inspections.

On-Campus Smoking Policy Student Plebiscite Vote:
Legislation was passed to add smoking policy change questions to the spring SGA election ballot to gain an official student opinion.

Readership:
Legislation was passed to adopt the Readership Program at K-State beginning next fall.

Current Projects

SGA Elections: Campaigning has begun for Senate positions as well as Student Body President and Vice President. Primary elections will be held Feb. 25 and 26th. General elections will be held Mar. 4th and 5th.

On-line Transcripts: Efforts will continue to be made to offer students access to unofficial transcripts without charge.

Saferide:
Efforts will continue towards the adoption of saferide program for K-State through privilege fees.

Fellow Students,

Please indulge me to take a moment to express my gratitude to all the Chief Justices and Associate Justices who have worked so hard this year on our judicial boards. They've done a wonderful job in our Residence Halls and on campus. Thanks for your help! Also, the time for selecting next year's judicial boards is quickly approaching. I would like to encourage all interested students to watch the Collegian ads for information on where to pick up applications. The ad should appear some time next month. If you have any question about our Judicial System, please contact me.

Tyson needs a lesson

Cat athletes speak more eloquently

SEAN PURCELL

Mike Tyson is misunderstood.

Well, maybe not.

He is on a lot of medication, though.

Have you noticed that Tyson has been a little more polite lately? During the weigh-in interview prior to the Tyson-Clifford Etienne fight, Iron Mike was cordial, almost friendly, with reporter Jeremy Schapp.

Then, after clocking Etienne 49 seconds into the first round, Tyson was the first to help the Black Rhino up, congratulating him on a valiant effort.

Is this the Tyson we are to become accustomed to? I hope so.

Still, Tyson needs some lessons on how to be a quote machine. I mean, he is one, but a bad one. "Fade into Bolivia" and "Eat his (Lennox Lewis') children" have not been Tyson's finest moments.

So as a service to a great guy, I have compiled a list of quotable K-State players and coaches who, if Mike wanted them to, could probably teach him how to speak with the media. These people make me happy to not have to interview someone like Tyson. However, if Mike ever wants to sit down for a one-on-one, I wouldn't pass it up.

So here are a few Cats gifted with words.

Terry Pierce. Technically not a player anymore, Pierce would easily be the best quote if he was still around. Maybe if he gets no love by NFL teams, he can go on a public speaking tour.

Best Pierce quote – "We don't like him. What he did to Aaron last year was totally uncalled for. For that reason, I

Cat men lose to Huskers

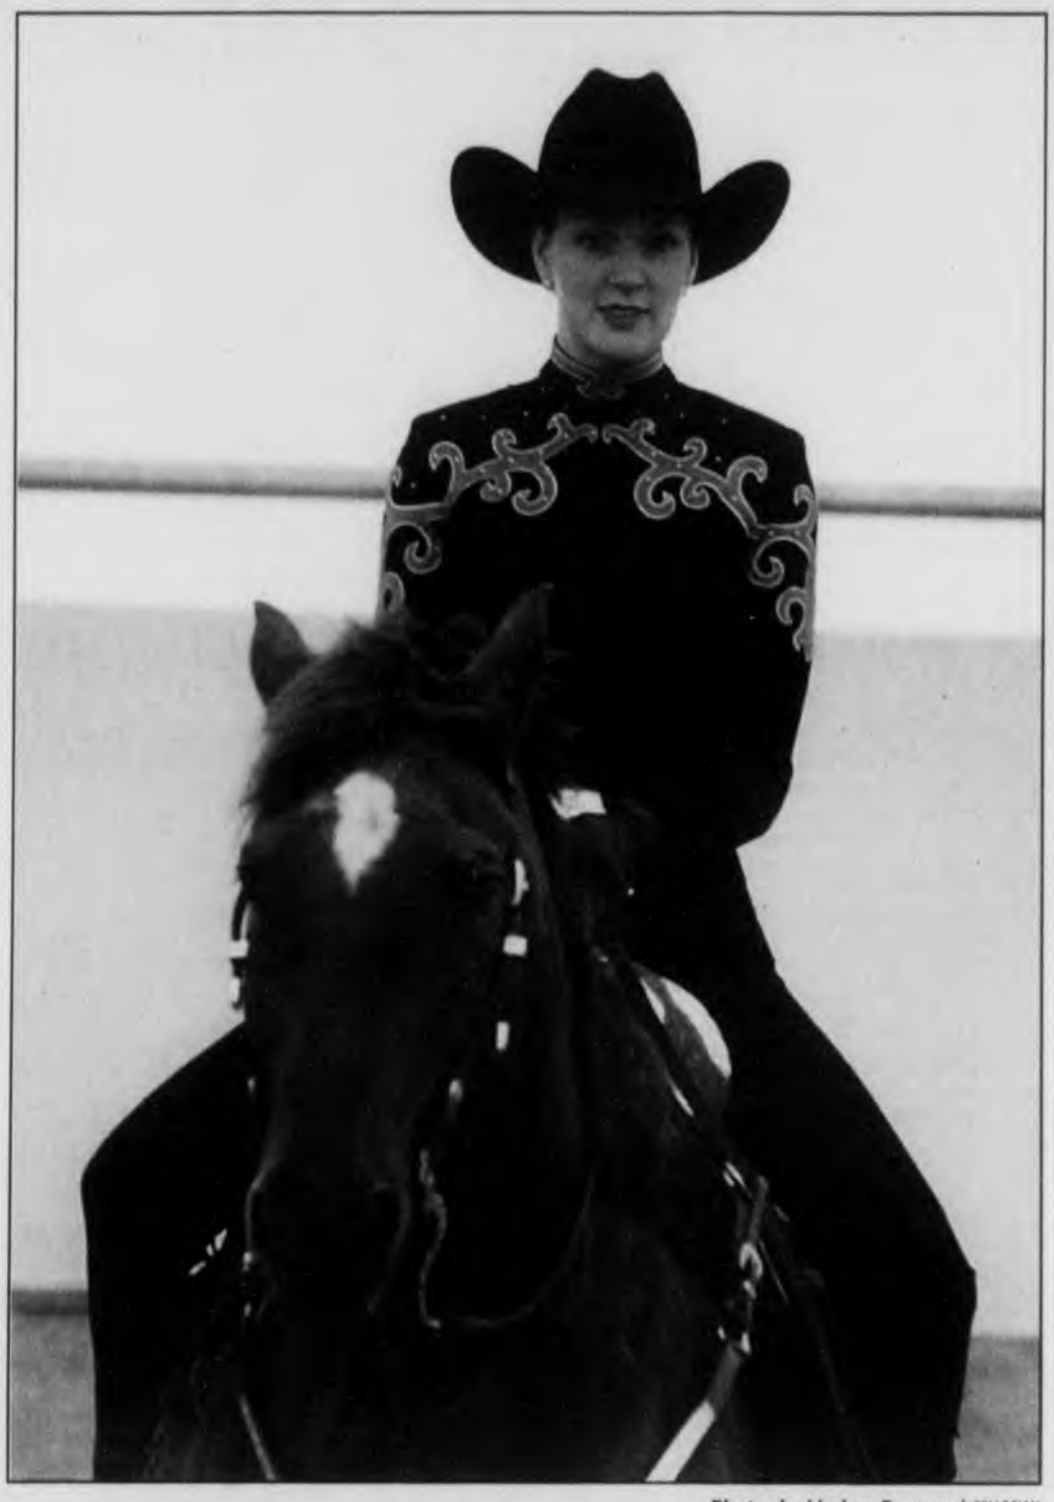
Andrew Drevo scored 19 points to lead four Nebraska players in double figures Tuesday night as the Cornhuskers defeated K-State 68-61.

Nebraska (10-16, 2-11) snapped a nine-game losing streak.

The Huskers won for the first time since an 80-77 victory over Colorado on Jan. 18.

K-State (12-14, 3-10) lost its 13th straight Big 12 road game and has now lost eight of nine since defeating Nebraska 77-53 in Manhattan, Kan., on Jan. 22.



Nebraska opened the second half with a 10-0 run to break a 34-34 tie, taking a 44-34 lead on Brennon Clemmons' layup and free throw with 15:38 left.

The Cats responded with a 12-0 run, going up 46-44 on Pervis Pasco's dunk with 10:15 left. Then K-State hit just one basket in the next nine minutes.

Nebraska took the lead for good on a Drevo 3-pointer with 7:04 left that made the score 50-49.

K-State never got closer than four down the stretch as the Cats missed six of their 16 free throws in the final 4 1/2 minutes.

Program remains strong

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While faithful Wildcat fans are well aware of the women's basketball team's pursuit of postseason glory, it's the K-State equestrian team that is booking the most dominating performances.

Considered by many to be the strongest program in the country, despite being in only its third season as a varsity sport, K-State is already at the top of its game.

Ranked No. 1 and No. 2 in Western and English competition, respectively, K-State has started postseason preparations despite having one event in each discipline remaining.

The Western team will be in action March 8-9 at Kewanee, Ill. Blackhawk Community College is having a competition March 8 with regional championships the following day.

The English team will be back at work March 15-16, at Fox Creek Equestrian Center west of Manhattan. A show is set for March 15 with K-State playing host to regional championships Sunday.

The top two teams advance from Region 2 competition to Zone 9 championships April 12-13. St. Mary-of-the-Woods will have the Western event in Terre Haute, Ind., while the English event will be held by

Unity important to equestrian team's success

One team.

Make no mistake. While the equestrian team splits into Western and English teams for competition, it remains one team.

"There's definitely a network of support," assistant coach Meghan Cunningham said. "There's no competition between the two, though."

Unless it's a little friendly competition.

"We definitely push each other as hard as we can to be the best we can be," senior co-captain Amanda Gigot said.

That push has led the K-State Western team to a No. 1 ranking in the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association while the English team is second in its discipline.

"We just have great girls and very talented riders," sophomore English rider Allison Woodworth said of the team's success.

She should know about success. Woodworth was High-Point Rider in two of three fall shows, and averaged six points per event heading into the spring season. Those marks put her among the best hunter seat open riders in the nation.

She also explained that it's hard to put a finger on the relationship between the two disciplines.

K-State's Jessica Lindsey, front, and Beth Jones, back, compete in Advanced 1 Horsemanship B at the K-State Western Show. Jones took first place in the event while Lindsey placed fifth.

"Some schools have one without the other," Woodworth said. "We practice separate and we have different coaches, but meetings are the same. We use the same facilities. It's two teams in one."

When K-State has a show for one team, the other team is often involved in setting up, preparing horses, and coordinating the event. A symbiotic relationship is apparent.

That relationship extends beyond the show ring, however.

"They send us good-luck gifts and are totally supportive," Woodworth said. "It's just really great."

According to Gigot, traveling and practicing separately can be difficult for team unity.

"I wish we could all see each other compete," Gigot said. "We always try to congratulate each other and wish each other good luck. It is difficult, though."

That difficulty is a non-factor to a few riders who pull double duty.

"Every rider has the option to participate in both," Cunningham said. "They have to practice four times a week as opposed to two, so it's definitely trying on the student athlete."

"I admire those girls who do it," Gigot said. "I wish I could do it, but it takes a lot of time. Those girls work their butts off."

Sophomore Dehlia Burdan is one rider who relishes the chance to ride both styles. She emphasizes the idea that she is part of one team, however.

"We are, even though we have separate disciplines, one team," Burdan said. "You don't say they're on one team or another. We're all very united."

That unity is wrapped around a simple concept, Burdan said.

"We all share in something we love to do. Most of us have ridden for along time, and it's just nice to have our sport at a Division-I school."

K-State men's, women's golf teams earn 3rd place finishes

Men's tournament shortened by weather

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's golf team shot its best score of the Central District Invitational during Tuesday's final round, but the Cats still finished third.

Sitting in second place going into Tuesday's final round, K-State fired a 305 in the final round, but Ohio State, which shot a final round 291, leapfrogged the Cats and won the team title.

Miranda Smith led K-State with a 226. Smith shot an even-par 72 in the third round and jumped eight spots to finish ninth.

Coach Kristi Knight said Smith rebounded nicely on Tuesday after shooting 10-over during the first two rounds.

"She played very well," she said. "It was actually kind of a strange day for her. She birdied three of her first six holes and then didn't make another birdie.

"After the first six holes, she was missing some greens and got into the tougher part of the course, but she made a lot of great pars," Knight said. "I'm really happy for her. She had a good solid round today."

K-State has lacked a high enough ranking in past years to get into the Central District Invitational, and Knight said she was pleased with K-State's inaugural performance in Parrish, Fla.

"It was a really good start," Knight said, "to finish tied for third in this event, being the first time we've been accepted into this field.

"We've been trying to get into this tournament for the last three or four years and just apparently haven't been good enough at the end of the previous year to be accepted," Knight said. "To come in and finish tied for third is good. It's a good way to start the

MLB | Bechler's widow plans lawsuit

The widow of Steve Bechler plans to sue the manufacturer of a dietary supplement the Baltimore Orioles pitcher was believed to be taking before his death.

Bechler, 23, died Feb. 17 from heatstroke after collapsing during a workout at training camp.

In his preliminary autopsy report, Broward County chief medical examiner Dr. Joshua Perper linked Bechler's death to a diet supplement that contains ephedra.

NHL | Andreychuk moving up scoring list

Tampa Bay Lightning captain Dave Andreychuk scored his 609th goal Tuesday night and moved into 12th place on the NHL career list.

Andreychuk's goal in the first period broke a tie with Dino Ciccarelli and put him just one behind Bobby Hull for 11th place on the list.

NFL | Broncos cut 3 starters

The Denver Broncos cut starters Chester McGlockton, Kavika Pittman and Denard Walker and four other players Tuesday as the team trims payroll before the free-agent signing period.

The Broncos were about $20 million over the salary cap heading into the free agency period, which begins Friday. Denver general manager Ted Sundquist said Tuesday's moves should clear about two-thirds of that amount.

NHL | Avalanche get Sakic back

The surging Colorado Avalanche received another boost Tuesday night when center Joe Sakic returned against the Edmonton Oilers after missing 15 games with a broken foot.

Sakic received a loud ovation when he entered a few seconds into the game between wings Radim Vrbata and Steven Reinprecht on Colorado's second line.

Sakic missed nine games in December after spraining his right ankle before returning Jan. 2 against Florida. Eight games later, he broke his foot on Jan. 20.

NBA | Lakers coach absent

Phil Jackson missed his first game as an NBA head coach Tuesday night, recuperating from having a kidney stone removed while his Los Angeles Lakers played the Clippers.

Assistant Jim Cleamons served as acting coach against the Clippers.

Team spokesman John Black said he was uncertain when the 57-year-old Jackson would return. The Lakers entertain Detroit on Thursday night and travel to Seattle on Friday night before taking four days off.

NBA | Magic to sign Nuggets guard

The Denver Nuggets are expected to release Chris Whitney on Wednesday so the veteran point guard can sign with the Orlando Magic, a team source told The Associated Press.

Whitney must clear waivers, but it is unlikely any team will pick up the rest of his $3 million salary. After the 48-hour waiting period, the Magic are expected to pick him up for a prorated amount of about $300,000.

MLB | Hollins signs minor league deal

Third baseman Dave Hollins, who spent most of last season on Philadelphia's disabled list, signed a minor league contract with the Phillies on Tuesday.

Hollins earned a roster spot with the Phillies last spring, but then went on the DL with an infected left knee as a result of spider bites from spring training.

Hollins played in just 14 games for Philadelphia, going 2-for-17.

'VAGINA MONOLOGUES'

Performance can benefit both men, women

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"The Vagina Monologues" can be described in three words: humorous, crushing and empowering.

These three adjectives were the reasons why Claflin Books and Copies, along with the Women's Center, supports the monologues, said Kim Hall, sales representative at Claflin Books and Copies.

"The Vagina Monologues" will be preformed at 7 p.m. Feb. 27-28 and March 1, in the Union Ballroom.

"We're just happy to support K-State and its worthwhile causes," Hall said.

Stormy Kennedy, the owner of Claflin Books and Copies, said she also thought it was a great way to support K-State.

"We just think it's a wonderful opportunity to support K-State and a great way to make changes," she said.

Playwright Eve Ensler interviewed more than 200 women about their vaginas and created the monologues, which were first performed in 1996, according to "The Vagina Monologues" Web site.

"I talked to older women, young women, married women, single women, lesbians, college professors, actors, corporate professionals, sex workers, African-American women, Hispanic women, Asian American women, Native American women, Caucasian women, Jewish women," Ensler said. "At first, women were reluctant to talk. They were a little shy. But once they got going, you couldn't stop them."

Show time
- When: 7 p.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday
- Where: Union Ballroom
- Cost: $6

"The Vagina Monologues" are part of a campaign created by Ensler, called V-Day, which coincides with Valentine's day.

"V-day is a campaign which is a movement. It can mean Valentines Day, violence, vagina or victory. It has a big meaning," said Alyssa Duncan, director of the K-State monologue performances and graduate student in drama therapy.

Duncan said she became involved with "The Vagina Monologues" after she found out the show might be coming to K-State.

"The campaign for non-violence, which is here on campus, wanted 'The Vagina Monologues' to come and so someone came to me, and I became part of the V-Day campaign. That's how "The Vagina Monologues are here," Duncan said.

There are two purposes to bringing "The Vagina Monologues" to K-State, Duncan said.

"We want to raise awareness and raise funds for local organizations working to stop violence," she said. "All of the proceeds of 'The Vagina Monologues' are going towards the campaign for non-violence and also the crisis center in Manhattan."

J.J. Wickham, senior in theater and one of the 21 performers in the show, said she felt that "The Vagina Monologues'" message is something that is important for K-State students to hear.

"Our campus doesn't do a lot of things to educate or get out the knowledge that "The Vagina Monologues" bring to Kansas State," Wickham said.

Joni Redmond, junior in theater and one of the performers, said that during the monologues the word vagina was often replaced by something else.

"One thing that the people in the monologues kept saying is that 'vagina' is not a word you're supposed to say," Redmond said. "You don't talk about that. It's your 'down there.' If you see the show, it's really intense. They're real women's stories, and they're so personal."

The monologues will also be beneficial for men, Redmond said.

"I think guys should come because they're the ones who are least educated and are some of the ones who are most uncomfortable," she said. "It pulls on your emotions, but it's also educational. What they're going to be hearing is new. It's going to be real eye opening. It'll be like, 'I never even thought about this, I never thought about how scared women are sometimes when they have to go out at night.'"

Wickham said the performance will show it is time to start communicating.

"It creates a safe environment. It says, 'Hey it's OK to talk about these things,'" Wickham said. "If it's OK to talk about your penises, it's OK to talk about our vaginas. We'll start communicating about it. I think communication is the first step to stopping violence."

To raise additional funds for the campaign for non-violence against women and the crisis center in Manhattan, the cast had a bake sale Feb. 13-14 in the Union.

Goods for sale included cookies sporting V-Day slogans and chocolate suckers in the shape of vaginas, in addition to plain cookies and brownies.

Following the performance, a representative from University Counseling Services and other campus agencies will be on hand to answer questions, said Dorinda Lambert, associate director and coordinator of clinical services at Counseling Services.

Lambert said she feels that this is a great way to educate about violence issues and to speak out for women.

"This is truly an opportunity for people to have a voice about violence against women," Lambert said.

"They'll listen to the words and hopefully change from this process."

MSNBC axes Phil Donahue's talk show after six months on the air

MSNBC fired Phil Donahue on Tuesday, abruptly ending the veteran talk show host's return to television after six months of poor ratings.

Donahue's final show will be Friday night. The news show that precedes him on the air, "Countdown: Iraq," temporarily will be expanded to two hours to replace him.

PERSONALITY PROFILE

Ali Karimi
Senior in economics

1. What did you have for dinner last night?
I had a buffalo burger.

2. What is in your CD player right now or who is your favorite artist?
Well, I guess I have 50 Cent. It's not my favorite artist — it's just what I'm listening to right now. I think the name of the album is "Get Rich or Die Trying."

3. What kind of car do you drive?
I don't have a car — I'm poor.

4. What was the last movie you saw and why?
"Old School," because I was hoping it was funny, and it was really funny.

5. What is your must-see TV show and why?
I don't watch TV, actually.

6. What is your favorite place to eat out and why?
In Manhattan, I guess the Amarillo Grill because they bring the bread out to you first. I like to start eating right away. Anywhere, I would probably have to go with Mobey Dick's in downtown D.C.

7. Who is your idol and why?
I guess I'll go with Johnny Unitas because he pretty much defines the old-school Baltimore era like football, just this dude who showed up and played. Johnny U's the man.

8. What is your favorite alcoholic drink?
Newcastle. It's a British beer.

9. What is the craziest thing you did in college?
I climbed on top of Rusty's Last Chance after the 1998 season and sawed off a piece of the goal post.

10. Have you ever cheated on a test?
No, not a test.

Pair of plays provide audience with option of chance vs. choice

By Rachel Krier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One question: Who or what controls the path of one person's life?

Two possibilities: fate and circumstance or one's own decisions.

The correct answer: That is for each audience member to decide for himself or herself.

The Purple Masque Theatre will present two plays that pose different options on the issue of chance versus choice.

The plays, "The Game of Life" and "The Man Who Couldn't Dance," will be conjoined for one theatrical show presented at 8 p.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday, as well as a matinee at 2 p.m. Saturday.

Dan Heinz, senior in theater, describes "The Game of Life" as a story of two people whose decisions are being made for them by two young, reckless spirits.

The play also looks at the difficulty and the possible dangers of that situation for the two humans, he said. The young spirits, controlling the people while playing a board game, are comparable to the gods of ancient Greek mythology, he said.

In contrast, "The Man Who Couldn't Dance" presents the story of a man who made his own decision and brought the consequences upon himself and his former girlfriend.

"The two plays together are about asking if the decisions we make come from inside us or from something external," Heinz said. "Both plays have a humorous element that is layered on top of the dramatic question."

Heinz, who plays one of the human puppets in "The Game of Life" and the lead male role in "The Man Who Couldn't Dance," said taking on the different roles has naturally led him to ponder the question of fate or choice himself.

Show time
- When: 8 p.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday and 2 p.m. Saturday
- Where: The Purple Masque Theatre
- Tickets: $3 for students and senior citizens, $6 for general public. Tickets are available at the McCain Box Office from noon to 5 p.m. by calling 532-6428, or online at www.ksu.edu/mccain. Saturday matinee tickets are only available at the door.

"Any time you're dealing with this sort of thing, it creeps into your thought. The questions stay with you outside of the play," Heinz said.

"I just hope the play connects with people on a very personal level so that it impacts their individual lives rather than something they view and discard."

"The Game of Life" is written by K-State graduate Allison Rushton. The stage setting resembles the actual board game, Life, with the costumes similar to the playing pieces.

The costumes for the spirits have a very surreal feel, mixing the concept of familiar and fantasy for the audience, said Aubrey Kershner, graduate student in theater and an actor in the production.

The transition to the second play is orchestrated by the character played by Joe Clark, junior in open-option, and involves a choreographed stage change in which the setting is transformed into an attic.

"All elements of the production and design reinforce the play's theme. A game moves space-to-space and a dance moves step-to-step so the scenery has an impressionistic style of stroke-by-stroke, and the music is note-by-note rather than chords," Vi Nhan Tran, senior in theater and English and production director, said. "We wanted the two plays to be seen as one."

EQUESTRIAN | Cats remain top in region, nation

Purdue University in West Lafayette, Ind.

Twenty-three riders have qualified individually for post-season competition. The top two riders advance from regional to zone championships. There, the top two finishers advance to nationals.

Two individuals can already be considered among the best in the nation, though.

On the English side, sophomore Allison Woodworth has a lock on the Region 2 bid to the Cacchione Cup. Riders qualify by leading the region in total points from open flats and open fences.

According to sophomore Dehlia Burdan, second in the region to Woodworth, the Cacchione Cup is the pinnacle in English equestrian.

"It's a pretty high honor because you got the most points of any open rider," Burdan said. "You have the top open riders from each region competing against each other.

"If you can say you won the Cacchione Cup, that's like a football player saying 'I won the Heisman.'"

Senior co-captain Amanda Gigot leads the region for the bid to the AQHA Cup, the Western equivalent to the Cacchione. Junior Brandi Vogel is hot on her heels.

"It's a very prestigious honor," Gigot said. "It basically means you're the top rider."

Equestrian is one of a select few sports where individual success often breeds team success.

The Western team opened its spring season by sweeping home events Feb. 8-9. Erin Peery won High-Point Rider honors both days in leading the Wildcats.

The English team, meanwhile, has boasted the High-Point Rider in every show this season. They are coming off first- and third-place performances Feb. 21-23, in Marion, Ill.

According to Burdan, the experience on the road will be beneficial down the stretch.

"It was good to ride different horses at another school," she said. "This is the only show we get to compete on someone else's horses. That we place first Saturday showed how strong our team is."

Assistant Coach Meghan Cunningham said that the third place finish Sunday wasn't indicative of her team's performance.

"We were the dominant team, even though we didn't win," Cunningham said.

As the Wildcats sit atop their region and the nation, Burdan said the focus becomes one of fighting off all challengers.

"It's easier to get to the top than to stay there," Burdan said. "In order for us to stay there, all of us are urging each other to do better. You have to work that much harder to stay ahead of the competition."

Gigot said confidence isn't a problem.

"I believe in our team," she said. "We have all the capability in the world. We're strongest in our region by far, and everyone is working hard to go all the way."

think a lot of players on the team don't like him and he's probably going to get some shots taken at him because of it. That's football," Pierce said of Southern California's Troy Polamalu prior to the Cats' rematch with the Trojans. Even better, Pierce and K-State backed up those words.

Matt Siebrandt. Comparable to Tyson in cool tattoos, Siebrandt and Iron Mike are both tough nosed dudes.

Best Siebrandt quote – "That wasn't the greatest competition in the world, but we went out and left no doubt," Siebrandt said after K-State demolished Arkansas-Pine Bluff 76-39 back in late December. The best thing Matt does is tell it like it is – win or lose.

Deb Patterson. Even though Tyson hasn't had stable relationships with women, I think Coach P could give good advice on how to include everything about a game in one quote and never swear when upset.

A Patterson quote (all are good) – "I couldn't be any more pleased with just individually with the effort and the competitiveness we brought to the floor. I'm not sure it was always as efficient and effective on the offensive end as we like to be, but I thought Kendra Wecker and Nicole Ohlde were just absolutely phenomenal in their willingness to compete in spite of sometimes the adversity of our own offense, relative to the defense that Texas was bringing to the floor. I was really just impressed with their competitiveness. Kendra Wecker, I thought, made some extremely tough shots. Ohlde stepped up and wanted to be a presence, possession by possession, down the stretch and throughout the second half. That was very big for our basketball team."

This was Patterson after a big win against Texas. What else is there to ask? She nearly covered it all. That's talent.

So there you go. Although it would be nice to have a Tyson around, spitting words that make you relieved you know how to articulate on a higher level than a doped-up person with Tourette Syndrome, I think I'll stick to interviewing well-spoken individuals that make my story better.

But maybe those people just need some help – and I'm sure the friendly people involved in K-State athletics would be willing to assist a decent human being like Iron Mike.

semester."

Problems arose in the second round of the tournament for K-State when the Cats stumbled to a 312.

"Yesterday afternoon was really kind of a struggle," Knight said. "We let a lot of shots go around the greens, but so did a lot of teams. It could have been better. They did the best they could do, so we'll take it.

Knight said coming back to Kansas' frigid climate will be tough after being in Florida for the last four days.

But, she said, finding practice time might be even tougher as the team prepares for a trip to Houston, Texas, next week for the Texas A&M Mo'morial.

"The weather definitely is a factor," she said.

"The good news is we leave again on Saturday to go down to Houston to play. It's something that you've got to deal with. We'll try to accomplish what we can indoors and that's all you can do."

One round and out

Teams at the Roadrunner Intercollegiate Invitational in San Antonio, Texas, found more freezing temperatures and rain Tuesday and were unable to finish the tournament, ending the event after 18 holes.

K-State finished in a tie for third place with North Texas after carding a 305. Junior Aaron Watkins, who finished second with a 2-over 73 on Monday, led the Cats.

Texas Tech won the 18-hole event with a score of 300, two strokes ahead of Arkansas.

In addition to the high turn-out, both the deputy county clerk and the county clerk said they appreciated having fewer polling booths.

"It was a really good relief as far as setting up poll booths," Jolene Campbell, deputy county clerk, said. "By having half as much, it saved a lot of time."

Vargo said reducing the amount of booths made the count easier, saved money, made it easier to train a smaller group of supervising judges and reduced the number of ballot styles needed.

DRUGS | K-State, city officials take drug use in residence halls seriously

Jack said marijuana is the only drug he has ever used. On average he smokes with friends in his room three times a week.

"There's not any spectacular stories about getting high in the dorms," he said. "We just wait until fairly late, and be careful about the smell when we smoke, and then sit around and watch movies and eat."

Marijuana should be legalized, Jack said, and it should be up to the individual how much he or she uses.

"Just like alcohol, you know – there's alcoholics, but they're not going to make it illegal because of them to ruin it for everyone else who drinks responsibly," he said.

For now, however, marijuana remains illegal, and Jack and other users have to face the consequences if they are caught.

Sarah Smith, freshman in elementary education, said drug use in the residence halls is wrong.

"It's not the smartest thing a person can do, but if they are going to do it, they shouldn't do it in the dorms," she said.

"I have never had a run-in with anyone where it was totally obvious, but I have heard that there are floors where it reeks," Smith said.

Eric Neilson, fifth-floor Marlatt Hall staff assistant and senior in advertising, said random searches are not allowed in the residence halls.

He said staff members on duty do two sets of rounds every night.

"If you're on rounds and you smell something like pot, or anything like that, you'll go ahead and check that out," he said. "If you're sure that's what it is, the first thing we do is contact our director of the hall. He's been trained in it, and he knows what it smells like. If it's a strong enough smell to where it'll still be there when the cops show up, we call the cops."

Neilson said he couldn't talk about any specific drug incidents in the residence hall.

The K-State Police respond to calls from the residence halls, said Lt. Richard Herrman, campus police patrol commander. The Riley County Police Department does have jurisdiction over the residence halls, but campus police respond because the campus is their primary responsibility, he said.

Campus police officers are commissioned law enforcement officers and have the authority to make arrests. Herrman said the only reason campus police officers would call the RCPD would be if the problem were very large. Otherwise, they handle drug situations in the residence halls themselves.

Other drugs have been found, but marijuana is the most prevalent, Herrman said.

"Because of its odor, staff can easily pick up on marijuana," he said. "But you could be sitting in your room doing a line of cocaine, and there is no way we would ever know about it unless someone witnessed you doing it and decided to notify us."

As far as which dorms have problems, Lt. Herrman said he couldn't say that one specifically is a problem area.

"The all-male or coed halls are the ones that we get the most calls on, as opposed to all-female halls," he said.

There is also no age trend, Herrman said.

"It affects any age group in the residence halls – not just freshmen," he said.

Campus police have a zero-tolerance policy on drugs in the residence halls, Herrman said.

"We don't issue warnings for any illegal substances. When we are alerted, we do an investigation, and, if necessary, make arrests," he said.

Brenda Jordan, assistant Riley County attorney, said Riley County does not take drug use lightly.

With marijuana, the first offense is a misdemeanor and the second is a felony, she said. Punishment is up to one year in jail and up to $2,500 in fines plus court costs and fees and, if applicable, attorney fees.

If there are no extenuating circumstances, the offender will face 30 days of jail time, $250 in fines, $25 in probation costs, $116 in court costs, a possible $125 evaluation fee and, if the Kansas Bureau of Investigation tests the substance, at least $400 in testing fees, she said.

"Intent to distribute charges have higher fines, more prosecution and more jail time," she said.

Drugs like methamphetamines or cocaine have different consequences, Jordan said.

"The charge is automatically a felony," she said. "The offender will go to prison instead of jail, and the court costs are more."

Derek Jackson, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services, said a drug arrest can break the resident's contract with Housing and Dining, but doesn't always. He said it's at the discretion of the department.

"We look at what your intent was," Jackson said. "We're concerned about the environment you're contributing to. As a resident, we're interested in knowing if you're a risk to yourself or others, and how great that risk is."

Jackson said that sometimes the department modifies a contract, which means it moves a student to a new residence hall.

"Once the department determines that they're not a severe risk to others around them, we try to help them begin brand new," he said. "When we re-establish them someplace else without a lot of stigma hanging over them, they're able to begin anew and make different friends."

This approach has been very successful, with no repeat offenders, Jackson said.

Housing and Dining does not have its own drug rehabilitation program.

Instead, officials refer students to university resources such as University Counseling Services, the Family Center and the Dean of Student Life office, he said.

Jackson said 1997 was his first year in his current role, and that when he came in, the department put more focus on preventing drug use.

"We thought it was becoming more commonplace, so we took a harder stance on it," he said.

Still, despite the risks, Jack and others like him have their own reasons for doing drugs in the residence halls.

"Recreation or relaxation," Jack said. "It's not a dependency. I don't feel like I need to or have to – it's just – I don't know. I'll have to think about that one, and then answer it for myself."

Drug use

The Core Alcohol and Drug Survey 2000 surveyed all college campuses.

Drug	Used in the last year	Used in the last 30 days
Tobacco	47 percent	35.8 percent
Alcohol	84.1 percent	72.1 percent
Marijuana	33.6 percent	20.0 percent
Cocaine	5.1 percent	2.1 percent
Amphetamine	7.6 percent	3.8 percent
Sedatives	4.1 percent	1.9 percent
Hallucinogens	6.6 percent	2.0 percent
Opiates	1.5 percent	2.7 percent
Inhalants	1.9 percent	0.8 percent
Designer Drugs	9.1 percent	3.7 percent
Steroids	0.8 percent	0.6 percent
Other	2.5 percent	1.1 percent

The study was conducted at random times during the year by randomly selected students comprised (in percentages) of 29.4 freshmen, 24.7 sophomores, 22.2 juniors, 20.6 seniors, 0.4 not seeking a degree and 0.7 other. Of those students, 39.6 were male, and 60.4 were female; 59.0 were age 20 and under, and 41.0 were 21 and older; 46.8 lived on-campus, and 53.2 lived off-campus.

capacity."

Eyestone said that although the recent tragedies do bring up public safety, he does not think it is a problem for the local area.

Eyestone is not the only owner addressing his employees about meeting fire codes. Rusty Wilson, owner of Rusty's Last Chance Bar and Saloon and Kite's, said he has also talked with his employees about overcrowding within his bars.

"We've briefed all our employees on not overcrowding any of our bars," Wilson said. "We are also making sure people know where the exists are for everyone's safety."

Public officials are also concerned with safety.

Manhattan's Fire Marshall, Jim McDiffett, said the fire department is doing everything they can to make sure owners are abiding by the fire code regulations.

McDiffett said each building goes through a thorough inspection semi-annually and must comply with the code in order to receive their liquor license but that does not mean companies do not change in between inspections.

"Our bars are doing a passing grade job in complying with our codes," McDiffett said.

Although local bars are meeting fire code regulations, McDiffett said he hopes people understand the importance of keeping their buildings safe.

"These tragedies are terrible," McDiffett said. "They're bringing new light to others, emphasizing that all regulations must be followed to save lives."

McDiffett also said he thinks local bars will take more consideration because of these recent tragedies.

Matt Church, owner of Longhorns, said he thinks his bar has done a good job in meeting regulations.

"We've always been good about meeting regulations," Church said. "We have a head count on a nightly basis to make sure our occupancy is not over the limit."

Church said he thinks local bars have everything under control.

"Everybody down here does their part and has everything under control," Church said.

Wilson said the fire department does a lot to ensure public safety in the area.

"The local fire department does a great job in making sure we are all up to code," Wilson said.

"We don't want anyone to get injured," Wilson said. "Building are replaceable, people are not."

Kansas (10-14, 3-10) vs. No. 5 K-State (25-2, 12-1)

7 tonight | Bramlage Coliseum (13, 340)

PERFECTION

Story by David Skretta | Photo by Evan Semón

K-State sophomore guard Laurie Koehn will cheer her team on as the Cats look to achieve a perfect 18-0 regular-season home record on Wednesday.

Cats set to conclude dominating home season

Perfect • adj. /per-fikt/ 1. having all required elements or qualities. 2. free from flaw.

With a win over Kansas tonight, K-State's 2002-03 home record will improve to 18-0 – only the fifth undefeated home record in school history.

A win also would run the Wildcats' home winning streak to 21 games, a stretch dating back to Feb. 13, 2002.

According to the Oxford Dictionary of Current English, K-State would be perfect.

Patterson expects better play from KU tonight

By Dan Smith

Kansas coach Marion Washington isn't anticipating a quiet Bramlage Coliseum for the Jayhawks' visit to Manhattan.

In fact, when KU (10-14, 3-10) and K-State (25-2, 12-1) tip off at 7 tonight, Washington said she expects a steady roar from Wildcat fans during K-State's final 2002-03 regular season home contest.

"I don't know that anyone can be prepared for Manhattan, especially being Kansas going in there," Washington said.

But Washington and Patterson both are counting on an improved Jayhawk basketball team taking the court against the Cats.

"We're going to be a little more confident than we were the first time out," Washington said.

Kansas couldn't have been much worse in the teams' first meeting on Jan. 8 in Lawrence.

K-State converted 21 Jayhawk turnovers into 25 points in the Cats' Big 12 opener, and KU managed to make only 29 percent

Koehn could play

Sophomore Laurie Koehn is again questionable for tonight's game against Kansas with a right ankle/foot injury.

"We've been integrating her into practice and just measuring her response to that activity," Coach Deb Patterson said Monday.

While that response has been encouraging, Patterson said she doesn't want to risk another injury before the postseason.

"Our emphasis at this point is wanting to be the very best we can in March as we head into the NCAA Tournament," she said. "We don't want to compromise any time she might need to be in a position to maximize what she can bring to the floor."

20 straight home wins should make Cats proud

BEN FEHR

Twenty in a row.

It's a pretty significant feat to do anything 20 times in a row in basketball.

Try making 20 free-throws in a row sometime. Try making 20 field goals in a row or passing the ball 20 consecutive times without a turnover or some kind of deflection.

And in the Big 12, the nation's best women's basketball conference, it's even tougher to get to 20 anything in a game.

But to get to 20 straight wins at home?

It's unheard of. Except for when you're talking about the ultimate-freako-insurrection-crushing-glass-chewing-basketball juggernaut that is Connecticut women's basketball, of course.

The staggeringly consistent Huskies have met 60 competitors at home during the last three seasons. And sent every one of them home with no love.

So it's difficult to talk about any kind of streak in the women's game without

Rivalry between K-State, KU to resurface tonight at Bramlage

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Kansas takes the floor tonight against No. 5 K-State, emotions will be running high.

The teams' 85th meeting is a significant one for the Cats. With a win tonight, K-State will secure its first undefeated season at home since they went 16-0 in 1986-87.

Not only is the streak on the line, but it also comes against the rivaled Jayhawks.

I-70 rivalry
- K-State leads the all-time series 44-40
- The Cats are 20-13 in Manhattan
- K-State has won the last three meetings
- KU is the Wildcats' oldest rival in terms of games (84) and years (34)
- The teams have played at least once every season since 1969
- K-State won the first game between the Sunflower State rivals 34-18 in 1969.

Nicole Ohlde, of Clay Center, Kan., said the rivalry was present when she was growing up.

"It was always really big when I was back at home," Ohlde said. "Either you chose K-State or KU. That was always big. It didn't matter if it was football, basketball, whatever – it was always really big. When anybody played K-State or KU, you always wore your favorite colors."

Kendra Wecker said it wasn't as big a deal in her hometown of Marysville, Kan.

"It is a little bit, just because any in-state rivalry is about one school versus another, and we're the top two schools in the state," Wecker said. "For me personally, it's fun now that I'm in college to play in it. But growing up, I really didn't think about it like that."

Not only is the rivalry present among players from each team, it also is a big deal to the fans.

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN
K-State's Laurie Koehn drives around Kansas' Chelsey Thompson at Bramlage Coliseum last season. The teams meet again at 7 tonight for the 89th time.

When K-State beat the Jayhawks 88-49 on Jan. 8 in Lawrence, purple-clad K-State fans made up the majority of the crowd. Coach Deb Patterson said she heard about the rivalry when she came to Manhattan from Vanderbilt seven years ago and believes the rivalry is stronger in fans' minds than in the players.

"I was made aware of it as soon as I got here," Patterson said. "It was really obvious that it was a longstanding, in-state rivalry that has tremendous roots. I think it's fun for the fans and on both ends of the stick. Certainly, it's a game that I know our fans, even more so than our players, get incredibly geared up and thrilled about."

As for Wecker and Ohlde, once the game starts, the rivalry is forgotten.

Teams bring high-scoring players to tonight's game

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas has three players who average double figures in points.

Tamara Ransburg, Crystal Kemp and Aquanita Burras all average about 10 points per game for the Jayhawks.

But K-State also has three players – Kendra Wecker, Nicole Ohlde and Megan Mahoney – who average double digits.

And when Laurie Koehn enters the lineup, as she may very well do against Kansas, the Wildcats have four players on the floor who are almost guaranteed to post at least 10.

Those four Wildcats ripped Kansas for 59 points – 10 more than KU's entire roster – when K-State beat the Hawks 88-49 to open Big 12 play at Allen Fieldhouse on Jan. 8.

KU's three double-figure scorers have the Jayhawks sitting in ninth place in the conference.

K-State is tied for first place.

But Wecker said KU is better than its record in the Big 12 shows.

"That just says a lot about the toughness of our league," Wecker said. "Each team we play is going to have at least two players in double figures.

Kansas' big three have improved to score 10 each per game. But Wecker and Ohlde are scoring nearly 20 per contest. Mahoney is averaging 13.6.

That difference, nearly 25 points, may well prove to be a big one in Wednesday's game.

Still, Ohlde said Kansas' best players won't be taken lightly.

"They're extremely athletic ,and they are young," she said. "In the next couple of years, they are going to be on the rise, and Marion Washington is a great coach who knows what she's doing.

"They have athleticism, and they have raw talent."

But that raw talent hasn't developed into wins. KU is 10-14 overall and just 3-10 in the Big 12.

Coach Deb Patterson said KU's experience has a lot to do with that – Burras is the oldest of the trio as a sophomore.

"KU, no matter who they line up against, will be facing a team that brings more experience to the floor," she said.

"Experience is huge in this conference. And their young players are doing well to average double figures. But I'm not sure they've established the depth they would like to in terms of production on the perimeter."

Kansas' struggles on the perimeter are most prevalent from beyond the arc. KU has just one player, freshman guard Erica Hallman, who has hit 20 3-pointers this season.

Wecker said the Wildcats will force KU to score from the perimeter.

"We're definitely going to make them prove they can shoot from the outside," she said. "They have girls who can shoot it, but we're just going to play big. We'll play zone and clog up the lane and make them make the outside shot."

The zone probably wouldn't be a bad idea against a team whose two top scorers, Kemp and Ransburg, both play the center and forward positions.

Patterson said everyone who lines up against KU these days looks to the post game first.

"I don't think that's a secret when anyone lines up against KU right now," she said. "Certainly, you have to contain the perimeter. But if there's a choice to be made, we certainly want to give a lot of attention to their post."

NCAA considering set-up changes

Future postseason tournaments could feature neutral locations

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A storm of controversy surrounds women's basketball.

Beyond the record-setting crowds, better play and improving atmospheres, a war of words is being waged.

The NCAA is tweaking.

Previously, the NCAA has awarded host sites to the top four seeds in each regional in March. This season, the NCAA chose the first and second-round host sites before the season began. Next season, things could change again.

The Division-1 Women's Basketball Committee is looking to meld the women's tournament into the mold of the men's event by establishing neutral sites for the big dance's opening rounds.

This is where the controversy begins.

Fans, coaches and players have all weighed in on the debate, and every person, it seems, has a different opinion.

K-State will be host to the first two rounds of this year's tournament for the second-straight year March 23-25 at Bramlage Coliseum. For that reason, most people are against the proposed neutral sites.

Vearl Webb, 64, of Manhattan, is a long-time K-State fan. Having attended women's basketball games for the past 20 years, Webb said he's in favor of the current system for one reason in particular.

"It's a reward," Webb said. "I think the tournament should go where the fan support is. I think it should go to schools that promote women's basketball."

Despite favoring the current situation, Webb said there are inherent problems.

"I think they choose too early, for one thing," Webb said. "There's a chance you get a host where their team isn't even playing."

That could be the case this year in Raleigh, N.C., where North Carolina State (11-14, 6-8) is struggling.

For a different reason, Coach Deb Patterson said neutral sites would be a step in the wrong direction.

"I'm really not a big fan of it," she said. "We've grown the game to the point where we're establishing ourselves with excited, enthused, great crowds. It makes for great television, great intensity of play."

"Teams that have earned the right to host should get to host. I truly believe our game is just so young and so unproven in its ability to sustain attendance."

Zach Long | COLLEGIAN

The Division-1 Women's Basketball Committee is considering moving first- and second-round games from host sites to neutral locations. If implemented, the process would eliminate home-court advantages during the tournament like K-State enjoyed last season.

Traveling might not have much effect on the loyalty of K-State's fans, though.

"I know when we played in Milwaukee at the Sweet 16, there were a ton of people that went up there," sophomore forward Kendra Wecker said. "The excitement the team brings and the excitement the fans bring for us, they're willing to go wherever we go."

Webb said he'd follow the team up to 500 miles for the first and second rounds.

That doesn't mean everybody would go to such lengths, however. Sophomore Nicole Schindler said distance would become a factor.

"It's nice having it here," she said. "They used to hold the Big 12 in Kansas City, and I'd go that far. For the first two rounds, I'd probably travel three hours at most."

Patterson said K-State's fans aren't the only ones opposed to neutral sites.

"I think if you were to poll women's coaches, they'd say the same," Patterson said. "If you were to poll the Women's Basketball Committee, though, it'd be another dimension."

Patterson said the controversy comes down to one simple issue.

"I'm all for getting what you earn," Patterson said. "If the obstacle of someone else's own court is too great to overcome, you weren't up to the task.

"I want what's best for the game, not my team that given day."

FEHR | Streak isn't best ever

first paying homage to Geno and the ladies of UConn.

Stanford, who owns the nation's second-longest streak, is only up four games on the Cats.

Mid-Majors Montana State, Creighton, and UC Santa Barbara also lead K-State by two and one games, respectively.

That said, K-State's streak is pretty amazing, even if it is only one third the size of UConn's.

Oklahoma, led by all-everything standout Stacy Dales, was the last opponent to strike paydirt within the hallowed purple halls of Bramlage Coliseum. The date was Feb. 13, 2002.

That same Oklahoma team made the NCAA finals last season before being knocked out by you-know-who.

Since that loss to the Sooners a year ago, K-State has beaten 20 straight in Manhattan and has looked impressive doing so.

This season alone, K-State is averaging a 20-point victory at home.

Tonight, the Wildcats, barring some kind of cataclysmic breakdown in achieved continuity, will make quick work of KU for win number 21.

But it's not like KU is limping into Bramlage.

It's more like the Hawks are crawling.

Losers in five of their last six and winners of just three conference games this season, KU will probably go down in a big way.

The Jayhawks will try to muster a better effort than the 88-49 debacle they surrendered on Feb. 8.

Every Wildcat player, and two managers, scored at least 10 points for K-State in the contest.

In the spirit of 21 straight for the Cats, I'd like to list a few things that have a better chance of happening tonight than KU beating K-State.

KU's football team will pull in a consensus top-20 football recruiting class.

KU's basketball team will lose to Texas A&M.

KU's basketball team will quit playing organized basketball and take up competitive cheerleading.

Roy Williams will break down after a flashback to the early-season blowout at the hands of the Tarheels team he should have been coaching and challenge Kirk Heinrich to an arm-wrestling match.

PERFECT | Cats look to have 1st undefeated home season in 17 years

The Wildcats are riding the third-longest home winning streak in K-State history, 10 back of the record, 30, set from Dec. 12, 1981, to Dec. 10, 1984. In addition, the Wildcats are riding the sixth-longest streak in the nation.

Coach Deb Patterson said finishing the season unbeaten at home is a microcosm of her team's success.

"I think it would be tremendous," Patterson said. "It'd be a great tribute and statement to their work ethic, consistency and the focus this young team has exhibited through a lot of adversity this year."

What is it about Bramlage Coliseum that brings out the best in the Wildcats, though?

"It's what the people bring and how they react to the game and react to different situations," sophomore Kendra Wecker said.

"Our fans are special because we love them and they love us.

"We're playing for them, all those families that bring five or six kids and bought tickets to see us play."

The fans have flocked to Bramlage this season. The Wildcats have drawn the sixth most fans in the nation, averaging more than 8,300 per contest. The Wildcats have played in front of sold-out crowds three times.

Home sweet home

The 2002-03 Wildcats could join select company again tonight. With a win, this year's team would become only the fifth club in school history to go undefeated at home. It also would go down as only the second undefeated February in history. The Wildcats last went without a February loss in 1982.

Season	Home	February	Overall
1971-72	6-0	9-1	17-5
1979-80	11-0	8-1	26-9
1982-83	14-0	6-2	25-7
1986-87	13-0	6-2	22-9
2002-03	17-0	7-0	25-2

Sophomore guard Chelsea Domenico said the winning ways in Bramlage extend beyond fans, however.

"The fans definitely do help, but we've also improved so much," Domenico said. "Our competitiveness and how we respond to things is a big difference."

It isn't just this season that the Wildcats have dominated at home, however. It's becoming a trend.

K-State is 143-63 at Bramlage, including an 87-14 mark in conference games.

The Wildcats have posted winning home records each of the past 10 years and in 31 of 35 seasons of K-State women's basketball.

Riding a 20-game home winning streak and poised to finish this season with one of the best records in program history, comparisons to some of the best K-State have already come.

Patterson said she has complete confidence in this year's crop of Wildcats.

"I think we'd stack up extremely well against the best teams K-State has ever fielded," Patterson said.

"They brought some incredible talent to the floor, but I think this team could compete favorably with any team you put on the floor."

On an individual basis, Domenico said, the 2002-03 squad is the best ever.

"Just knowing the players – Nicole Ohlde, Kendra Wecker," Domenico said. "Those girls are hard to beat and harder to come across."

While that debate remains in the future, players have set their sights on the present. That means carrying the home winning streak into next season via a win Wednesday against Kansas.

"If we would happen to win, it'd be an honor," Wecker said. "That's what home court advantages are all about. We're just going out and playing like every other game this year, having fun and enjoying it."

KANSAS | KU expected to offer tough competition in matchup of its field goals in an 88-49 blowout at Allen Fieldhouse.

Things might be different tonight, though.

"Every team in this league continues to get better," Patterson said, "and I think particularly in the post, this Kansas team has really begun to establish some consistency."

KU's freshman tandem of forwards Tamara Ransburg and Crystal Kemp is the primary reason for the Jayhawks' improvement.

Kemp (10.9 ppg, 5.8 rpg) leads the team in scoring, and Ransburg (10.8 ppg, 7.8 rpg) is Kansas' top rebounder. Patterson said each could give the Cats fits in the post tonight.

"Ransburg and Kemp both have the ability to be real dynamic factors in a basketball game inside," Patterson said. "It goes without saying that this Kansas team will be better and more confident and bring a tighter game to the floor than they had at the beginning of the season."

Seven Jayhawk freshmen will compete at Bramlage for the first time tonight, but despite their inexperience with the environment, Washington said her players know something about the K-State-Kansas rivalry.

"We understand it is an emotional setting," she said. "Kansas State is certainly one of those special matches."

The game will be special for the Cats too, as K-State tries to cap an undefeated season at Bramlage and stay one step ahead of Texas for the top seed in the Big 12 Tournament.

But as much as the rivalry means to fans, Patterson said that in a larger sense, tonight's battle for bragging rights is simply the next step toward the Cats' postseason goals.

"There's still a lot of basketball between these last three games and the Big 12 Tournament," Patterson said.

"We've got a real humble group. They've got such a great appreciation for the nature of the challenge that the teams in this league bring."

RIVALRY | KU, K-State competition makes games interesting, exciting

"Any game we play is just exciting in itself," Wecker said. "I suppose the rivalry brings a little something extra to the game like bragging rights for students of the schools or fans."

As for Patterson, she understands what the rivalry means to fans and is looking forward to seeing them come out tonight and cheer her team in it's quest for a perfect season at home.

"I don't know that (the streak) makes the rivalry any bigger, but it makes us feel good about being home in front of fans that we know will really do their very best to come out tonight," Patterson said. "Because we are playing KU, I'd expect we'd have a better crowd tonight than we would on most Wednesdays simply because the Jayhawks are rolling into town and people have a lot of enthusiasm, excitement and pride in that rivalry.

"It usually brings out the very best in fans on both sides."

O'Hara, Osborn Move On

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN

John O'Hara, presidential candidate, and Travis Stryker, vice-presidential candidate, celebrate at Pat's Blue Rib'N Barbecue after receiving 1,328 votes in the primary election. The pair said they would focus on reaching more students in the week before the final election.

Matt Elliott | COLLEGIAN

Eric Neilson, senior in advertising, Tammy Jo Osborn, presidential candidate, Andrew Bell, senior in management information systems and Sarah Laib, freshman in political science all celebrate as Osborn and Quackenbush move on to the final elections. "I think that there is only one step more to make a difference for K-State, I'm excited to see us get here," Osborn said.

Official results available at 1p.m. today

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Presidential candidates John O'Hara and Travis Stryker will face Tammy Jo Osborn and Julie Quackenbush in the general election March 4 and 5.

Elections Chair Mark Threeton said the unofficial tally showed 2,284 students, or 12.1 percent of eligible voters, logged in to vote in the primary election. The turnout was slightly less than last year's primary turnout of 13.9 percent.

Candidates Eric Hoopingarner and Layton Ehmke nabbed 251 votes, while Julia Hiles and Ashleigh Sumner received 75. Both pairs were eliminated from the race.

Results were not made official until today, Threeton said, and are available at the elections Web site, www.k-state.edu/election. There will be adjustments in some of the totals, because there were some conflicts in the numbers, he said.

The grand total did not allow for the amount of write-in votes.

However, these changes will not be enough to alter any of the results, Threeton said.

At K-State-Salina, candidates Robbie Sanders and Chad Sanders led with 129 votes, followed by Paul Homan and Douglas Zerr with 70. Eric Runner and Mark Frederick received 22 votes and were eliminated from the race.

There was one write-in candidate for K-State-Salina and many for the main campus's election. Threeton said the exact number of write-in votes would not be available until the official results are tallied today.

Unofficial results

This is a summary of the unofficial results of the SGA primary presidential election.

- John O'Hara/Travis Stryker 1,328 votes
- Tammy Jo Osborn/Julie Quackenbush 536 votes
- Eric Hoopingarner/Layton Ehmke 251 votes
- Julia Hiles/Ashleigh Sumner 75 votes

Official results will be available at 1 p.m. today at www.k-state.edu/elections.

Student dies in vehicle rollover

Alcohol determined factor in accident

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Christopher Lee Blevins, sophomore in animal sciences, died Saturday after injuries sustained in a car accident.

At 2:54 a.m., northwest of Leavenworth near Blevin's Easton home, Blevin's father Michael Blevins, was driving a truck on Seven Sisters Road when he lost control of the vehicle.

The vehicle was rounding a curve on the gravel road when the driver lost control of the vehicle and went through a fence and into a nearby pasture, where it overturned several times. Christopher Lee Blevins was ejected through the passenger-side window.

He sustained head and internal injuries and was taken to Cushing Hospital and then airlifted to University of Kansas Medical Center, where he died. Michael Blevins was not injured in the accident.

Christopher Lee Blevin's adviser, Mike Brouk, described him as quiet and fairly reserved.

"He was looking forward to the opportunity to work with our meats judging program at K-State," Brouk said.

It is unknown if the vehicle speed was a factor in the accident, but alcohol was determined to be a factor, said Ann Magee, Leavenworth County patrol division clerk.

No charges have been pressed against Michael Blevins because the report is still being processed, but charges are expected, Magee said.

O'Hara, Stryker advance with 1,328 votes in primary election

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It only took one word to get the crowd gathered at Pat's Blue Rib'N Barbecue to erupt into cheers – "John."

The crowd was cheering in support of John O'Hara and Travis Stryker's win of the primary student body president and vice president election Wednesday night.

O'Hara and Stryker received 1,328 votes, followed by Tammy Jo Osborn and Julie Quackenbush, who received 536 votes, according to the unofficial results.

It was smiling faces, pats on the back and hearty handshakes all around for the pair, who said they were excited about the win, but not complacent.

"We are excited – we are extremely excited to make it past this primary, but Travis and I are not complacent," O'Hara said. "When we decided to run for student body president and vice president, we wanted to have a strong finish.

"Over the course of this next week, we are going to try to do everything we can to get out and talk to students – to let them know about our issues and get feedback from them."

Stryker said the pair would use the extra week to reach students they hadn't talked to before the primary election.

"We've tried really hard to do as much as we could for the first three weeks of our campaign, but with this week extension, we hope to kind of

536 votes propel Osborn, Quackenbush to final round

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Presidential candidate Tammy Jo Osborn screamed and hugged nearby supporters in Rock-A-Belly Deli on Wednesday night after hearing primary election results.

Osborn sat in a crowded booth among yellow- and blue-clad supporters while her running mate, Julie Quackenbush, celebrated in Chicago, more than 600 miles away. Quackenbush left Tuesday afternoon to apply for an internship with Nestle.

"This is kind of like a nod that we're addressing the student body's needs," Osborn said. "I'm just excited because we worked really hard to make sure we are communicating with the student body."

Osborn said she was so excited, she couldn't hear election numbers over the cheers of the crowd.

According to unofficial results, Osborn and Quackenbush received 24 percent of the vote with 536 votes – placing them 792 votes behind John O'Hara and Travis Stryker.

However, Osborn said they aren't discouraged.

"We're both exceptional candidate pairs who could do a wonderful job as student body president and vice president," she said. "Julie and I have an intense desire to serve the student body and that desire drives us to do the best we can."

The pair will spend the next few days speaking to student organizations

Senior struck by car on campus, no blame being placed for accident

After being struck by a car on campus, a K-State student was transported to the hospital.

Molly Miller, senior in English education, was admitted to Mercy Health Center, but no information on her condition was released.

Capt. Robert Meligren of the K-State Police said there was not a crosswalk where Miller was hit and no blame was being placed at this time.

Fort Riley soldier sustains burn injuries, listed in serious condition

Officials say cadet doused self in alcohol

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Fort Riley soldier was burned late Tuesday after dousing himself in alcohol.

Pfc. Jason Finfrock, 20, of Company C, 1st Battalion, 41st Infantry, was burned on more than 50 percent of his body when another soldier in the room lit a flame and caught Finfrock's body on fire, according to a press release.

"The incident involved two people, but we aren't sure if there was anyone else," said Christie Vanover, deputy media relations officer at Fort Riley.

After he was taken to Irwin Amy Community Hospital, he was taken by air to the University of Kansas Medical Center by Lifestar from Topeka around 12:15 Wednesday morning.

The reasons behind the incident remain unclear.

"It's being invested by the Military Police Investigations and the Criminal Investigation Division in Fort Riley," Vanover said.

According to the press release, Fort Riley Fire Department responded to the call and reported no damage to the barracks.

Finfrock received second and third degree burns. A University of Kansas Medical Center representative said he is listed in serious condition in the intensive care unit.

Photographer speaks at Beach Museum

Pulitzer Prize-winning photographer Neal Ulevich speaks to student photographers before giving his presentation, "New Technology: Vietnam and Afghanistan" at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Journalism technology has evolved significantly from the Vietnam War to present-day coverage, a Pulitzer Prize-winning photographer said Wednesday.

The A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art were responsible for bringing Neal Ulevich from Denver, Colo., to speak to students about his photographic documentation of how technology has changed in 30 years.

When Ulevich was photographing the Vietnam War, photographers would send their photos over a slow, complex transmission process using short radio waves, he said.

Todd Simon, director of the journalism school, said he remembers during the war being on the other end of the wire machines in the newsroom.

"He made it look really simple, but it's pretty technical, and it's an incredibly tedious process," Simon said.

After all of the developing and processing steps, Ulevich said a good photograph was more of an exception than a norm.

After the use of radio waves, the journalism technology developed to scanning film negatives and the use of an analog wave.

He said that everything is digitalized now, and photographers can send pictures through a ship's e-mail.

He said he spoke with photographers who documented Afghanistan in 2002 and most of them only brought digital cameras, and if they brought a film camera it was used for back up.

"When I was in Vietnam, I was always aware of history and thought ultimately I knew the pictures I took would be a part of history," Ulevich said. "After the war, I got a lot of calls from colleagues asking if they had pictures of them."

Ulevich said he started as a reporter but realized photographers got much closer to the action so he switched.

But he stressed the importance in the journalism field of being capable of doing both.

He said photographing was a high school hobby, and he gained interest in Asia through a college crush. There was a girl taking a course in Chinese history, and he wanted to take it because she was taking it.

Although things didn't work out between the two, his sudden interest in Asia was undeniable. This interest led him to move to China after graduation, which is where he took his Pulitzer Prize-winning photograph.

The photograph, on display in the Beach Museum, shows a child in the middle of a circle of children holding a folding chair over his head between beatings of another child who was being hung with a rope.

Ulevich said the Vietnam War left a lasting impression on him.

"It's taught me that life is fragile and a temporary thing. Vietnam taught me death is very much a part of life," he said.

Primary Elections 2003

Duo not saddened by loss, call race 'learning experience'

By Katie Lane
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Julia Hiles

Ashleigh Sumner

Relief.

That's the word presidential candidates Julia Hiles and Ashleigh Sumner described the results of the primary elections after finding out they came in last place.

"We wanted it, but there were some parts that we were like, 'You know, if we lose, it's no big thing,'" Hiles said.

Hiles and Sumner received 75 votes during the election. When the unofficial results were announced, all Hiles did was nod her head.

"Yep, I knew that. I don't even want to know how many votes I had," she said.

The loss can be attributed to the lack of campaigning, Hiles said.

"We would've campaigned more if we would've had more time," Hiles said. "Ashleigh and I are both really busy this semester."

The team didn't spend any money on the campaign because they felt that they had all the resources they needed, Hiles said.

"We weren't planning on spending any money," Hiles said. "With the resources we both have, we could've done it."

Getting their name out was also a problem because the team missed both the debate on KSDB-FM 91.9 and the forum in the K-State Student Union due to tests, Hiles said.

Sumner said that losing the election was positive because she is graduating in December.

"It was actually a really good thing," she said. "I think the people who won can put in the time and effort that it needed."

After the Collegian rejected a letter to the editor from the team, Sumner said she lost all of her energy to campaign. The letter was rejected because of Collegian election policy.

"I learned a lot from it," Sumner said. "For instance, I learned to stick up for myself. Things happened that shouldn't have happened, and it took our drive away."

Hiles said she wasn't disappointed in the results because the students elected who they wanted.

"I personally believe 'may the best candidate win,'" she said. "The promotion of fitness is what we're concerned about. A lot of people are concerned with politics and the book exchange, but we wouldn't have picked this major if we didn't think health was important."

Sumner said she encourages students to vote for Tammy Jo Osborn and Julie Quackenbush.

"I think Tammy Jo and Julie want it for the right reasons," Sumner said. "With the four of us running, there were a lot of different personalities, a lot to choose from."

Pair criticizes high spending, does not endorse candidates

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Eric Hoopingarner

Layton Ehmke

A somber mood fell upon Gumby's Pizza and Pub in Aggieville on Wednesday night, as presidential hopefuls Eric Hoopingarner and Layton Ehmke heard they would not advance to the general election.

The pair came in third with an unofficial 251 votes, behind John O'Hara and Travis Stryker at 1,328. Tammy Jo Osborn and Julie Quackenbush received 536, according to the unofficial tally.

Hoopingarner's eyes were watery as he heard the results and was stricken with disappointment when he said they would not endorse any of the other candidates.

"Look at the issues. There is no one, really," Hoopingarner, junior in economics and social science, said.

Ehmke, senior in print journalism, said he was disappointed for K-State students because of the other candidates' platforms.

"I don't think O'Hara or Tammy Jo are bringing 311," he said. "Sorry K-State."

The pair said their financial situation hindered the success of their campaign.

According to the expense reports filed by the other candidates, Hoopingarner and Ehmke were ranked third in expenses. O'Hara and Stryker, the top candidates, spent $2,000 more than Hoopingarner and Ehmke. Osborn and Quackenbush, finishing second in the primaries, spent almost $600 more.

"I wish I had $3,000 to spend on a campaign," Ehmke said.

Hoopingarner, who also finished in third place last year, said, "Every year, it's the same. The people who spend the most money win."

He said finances could limit some people from running, which is unfortunate.

However, he and Ehmke agreed and said that a person with limited funds could win. They said they would have to be extremely organized and talk to a lot of people.

Despite all the work, there were no regrets about their campaign, the pair said.

"I met a lot of cool people," Hoopingarner said.

The pair said that they should give their supporters credit.

"We have 251 people who care about us," Ehmke said. "Your vote was not wasted.

Although the pair's intent was to move on, both plan on running for Student Senate. Both candidates said they would still try to bring the musical group 311 to Manhattan and help enforce Title IX.

In addition, Hoopingarner and Ehmke said they hope their campaign brought issues to the forefront.

"We just hope we got people to think," Ehmke said.

Brothers, Homan-Zerr ticket move on to compete for Salina presidency

Candidates ready to concentrate efforts on general election

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two pairs are moving forward in search of K-State-Salina's top positions after Wednesday's primary election results.

Capturing the highest vote totals, Robbie Sanders and Chad Sanders will face Paul Homan and Doug Zerr in the general election March 4 and 5.

Robbie and brother Chad received 129 votes, or about 58 percent.

"It's awesome," Robbie said.

"That is a great amount, and we are excited about the results."

The Homan/Zerr ticket captured 70 votes, or about 32 percent.

"It is such a relief that the

Robbie Sanders

Chad Sanders

Paul Homan

Doug Zerr

first part is over," Zerr said.

"It is also cool that we received that many votes."

Both pairs said they will now focus on campaigning for next week's general election.

"We have still got a lot of people to talk to," Robbie said.

"We have to get things in gear and focus on the rest of the election."

Zerr said he and Homan plan to re-evaluate their strategy and focus on gaining extra votes.

"We want to keep doing what we are doing, but also focus on the votes from the losing candidate," Zerr said.

"We would like to pick up those votes."

The third pair, Eric Runner and Mark Frederick, received 22 votes, or about 10 percent.

"We did our best," Runner said.

"Now we will probably go back to what we usually do – watching movies and sleeping."

Runner said they haven't decided if they will run again next year or if they will support a candidate in the general election.

"It is all up in the air right now," he said.

Write-in candidates Kenneth Meyer and Johnny Keopraseuth received one vote for a total of 222 votes from K-State-Salina students.

Foundation loses $4.2 million in flailing stock market, may cut scholarships

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The sagging stock market is giving the KSU Foundation headaches – a $4.2 million headache that could affect student scholarships.

Scholarships could be affected as soon as the 2004-05 school year, said Alan Klug, Foundation vice president for administration and finance.

The Foundation distributed $34 million in fiscal year 2002, and that number could be reduced by $4.2 million this fiscal year, Klug said.

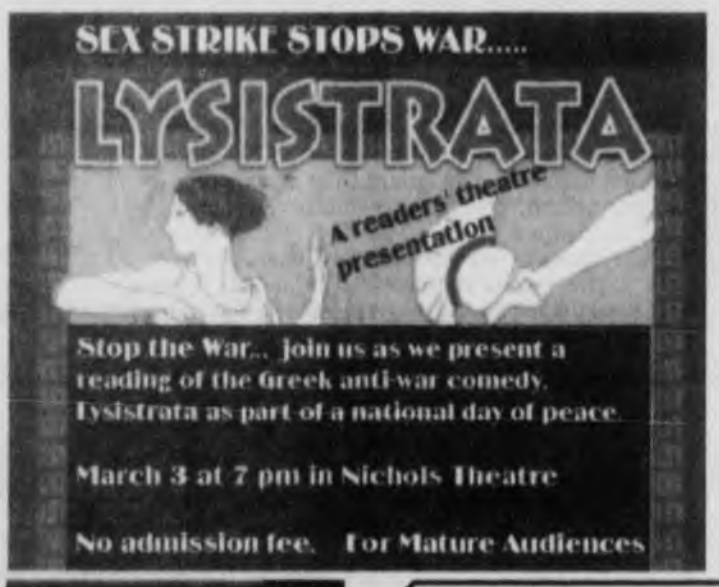
"If this goes on, it gets worse," said David Weaver, Foundation vice president for real estate and investments.

Donations to the Foundation are pooled in an endowment fund. The money gains interest, and also is subject to the ups and downs of the stock market. Klug said the Foundation can disburse money from dividends and market appreciation, but the original gifts from donors cannot be touched.

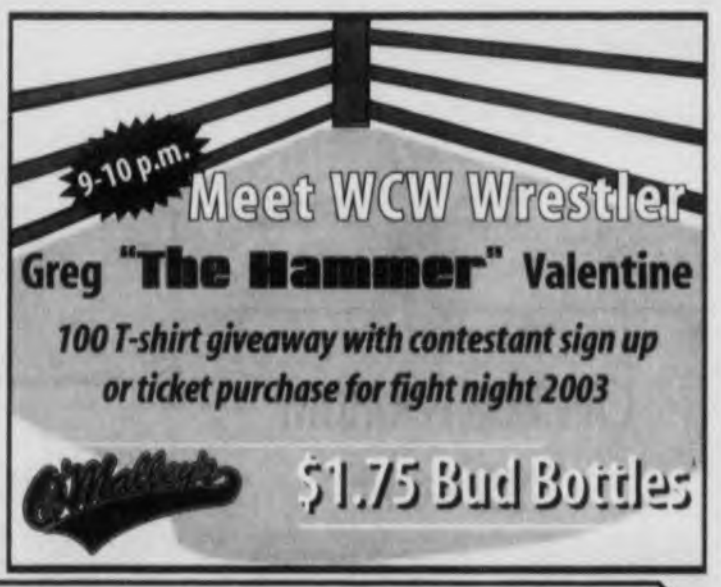
With the market's downward trend the past two years, the amount available to the Foundation has been dwindling – the market value dropped 3.34 percent in fiscal year 2001 and another 4.27 percent in fiscal year 2002.

The Foundation contributes only about one-half of one percent of the university's total budget, but these losses could prove harmful to student scholarships and discretionary funds, Gary Hellebust, Foundation president, said.

"We can find creative ways to compensate," Hellebust said, "but if it lasts two or three years, the effects could be catastrophic."



Reserve funds – money that built up during a burgeoning 1990s market – have been used as "rainy day" funds to compensate for the lackluster market, Klug said. But now the reserves are as low as they can comfortably go, he said, and the Foundation is being forced to seek other means to continue its duties.



The fate of the scholarships could rest on the shoulders of the donors, Klug said.

TO THE POINT

Staying safe, calm important on icy streets

Bad weather, Manhattan's driving conditions and road rage are all issues drivers should keep in mind when they venture out for a drive.

The recent increase of automobile accidents in the Manhattan area highlights the continuing troubles Manhattan motorists face. Drivers should be cautious of their pedestrian counterparts, especially during unfavorable conditions that increase the probability of accidents.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

It is also important that drivers remain calm and collected, whether making their way through winter snow, sharing the road with other motorists or yieldng for pedestrians in appropriate spots.

Road rage can sometimes be a natural response, but it often goes too far. Aggression behind the wheel can quickly lead to other drivers becoming angry, or worse, injuring or killing yourself or others on the road.

Keeping your cool out on the road is not only helpful for your own mental wellness, but also for the well-being of everyone else on the road.

WHAT THE WORLD NEEDS NOW

Illustration by Adam Hayes | COLLEGIAN

A little love, compassion goes long way

NASRINA BURNETT

Have you ever asked yourself what you would do if someone handed you a check for a million dollars?

This is where some people start making elaborate shopping lists of all the cool stuff they could buy. New cars, fancy clothes, expensive jewelry or an elaborate home entertainment center top many lists. My list is a bit different.

I would try to figure out how much of the money I could give away. I admit I would keep some of the money to pay off my car loan and put away a little something for emergencies and graduate school. I would also want to do something nice for my loved ones, but the majority of the money would be charity bound.

After all, I'm not starving. I'm not in danger of sinking below the poverty line. I probably don't need the money as much as other people do. This is why I simply don't understand that there are people starving in this world. It seems to me that if the rich would just give a little to the poor, then it would all balance out.

Just think, if we'd put as much funding into researching a cure for cancer as we put into developing new weapons of mass destruction then it might have already been discovered. Curing diseases, battling poverty and combating our other social problems should be on everyone's list of millionaire dreams.

I am obviously an idealist. When I come back down to earth, I realize the truth is that money is king. Whether we like to admit it or not, greed has more power and influence than compassion or empathy. Greed is especially powerful because of the ease in which it is justified.

It's easy to enjoy wealth when one claims to have earned it. This means that people who are less fortunate simply didn't work hard enough or possess the proper abilities. So why should someone who has earned their position sacrifice to help others?

I can't answer this question in a way that will satisfy everyone. My personal reasoning simply tells me that it's the right thing to do. If you have the means to help others, then you help others. I guess it goes back to the golden rule: Do unto others as you would have them do unto you.

If I was starving and in a bad situation, then I would hope someone would help me out. I'm not saying that I believe in free rides. I believe in giving people chances. I also believe that having too much materialistically deprives a person from fully experiencing life's simple pleasures.

When you're overwhelmed by having nice things, can you still take the time to value a really nice person? If someone else is paid to clean your house, then will you still feel the pride of keeping your home? Having very few things keeps life simple and focused.

I have noticed that the more a person has, the more they need. On the other hand, if you keep your life simple, it won't take much to make you happy. I think this lesson is important for us to remember as we're going through the time where we proudly call ourselves "poor college students" and bemoan our inability to afford the luxuries of life.

These are the best and richest years of our lives. We aren't just in college so that we can get well-paying jobs. We're here so that we can attain something priceless. Friendships, experiences, love and personal growth will retain their value no matter what.

When mad or just bored, try sticking Bush's head on dog

CHRISTOPHER HARROP

When was the last time you spent over an hour trying to place President Bush's head on the bodies of various characters from the classic Stanley Kubrick film, "Dr. Strangelove"?

To paraphrase Hunter S. Thompson, there is very little in this world more sad or disheartening than the addiction those like myself suffer from: photoshopping.

Following in the grand tradition of design artists and communist propaganda officers, manipulation of photographs has now elevated into a popular form of digital art and humor. Using Photoshop, the popular Adobe Systems Inc. software product, anyone can use a simple crop, cut and paste to entertain or make a statement about global politics.

Numerous Web sites FARK.com, PhotoshopContest.com and many others–now sponsor contests devoted to creating the funniest or well-done images. Some of the most popular are based off of pop culture idols and public figures. Still, there are always the clichés.

The most frequent and obvious images are derived from various clichés that have developed from cult icons on the Internet. Anyone who spends a decent amount of time browsing through photoshops will regularly catch a glimpse of Admiral Ackbar from the original "Star Wars" trilogy or a small Japanese cartoon character named Domo-kun.

Most of the time, these attempts at humor would be perceived as a waste of bandwidth by the average person. However, they hold a greater significance to both the online world and the realms of copyright and freedom of speech protections.

While no true legal precedents have been set concerning photoshopping, the issue is inherent: the rampant use of copyrighted and other protected images often will raise the ire of rights holders.

One of the most visible cases of legal complainants against photoshoppers concerned humor site SomethingAwful.com ran an edition of its "Photoshop Phriday" series concerning humorous takes on Jim Henson's Muppets. The folks at Henson were not happy with this and threatened legal action within hours of the posting of the feature.

Sites like SomethingAwful rarely have the wherewithal to combat threats of legal complaints; still, the issue of corporate dominance over individuals is not even the biggest question in this scenario.

Much like many other claims, Henson would have had to make a distinction between what is considered parody and satire. Parody enjoys a number of free speech protections, whereas satire holds few and far in between.

Mix in a number of recent legal decisions concerning protections given to rights holders concerning commercial media and you have the makings of a sticky First Amendment situation.

While many of the images produced by photoshopping contests do not qualify as parody, or even good humor or art, the limitation of independent voices to make comments through any form of media is bound to be detrimental to a free society.

Furthermore, photo manipulation is a hobby and important creative outlet for those of us who gave up learning to play the viola in middle school. Many others get hours of free entertainment from non-commercial outlets that host photoshopping contests.

Then again, how far do we really need to extend rights to accommodate nerds with nothing better to do with their time than place the heads of SGA candidates on the bodies of Nazi officers in the Third Reich?

If rights holders and photoshoppers can come to some form of compromise between the public relations of proprietary holdings and freedom of speech, the Web will be a much better place.

Staying in shape benefit of lifeguarding

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN

Brett Estes, senior in baking science and management, watches over swimmers at the Natatorium. Estes has worked at the Natatorium for four years working about 15 hours a week. He was also a lifeguard before he coming to K-State.

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the lifeguards at the Natatorium, swimming is a daily activity.

Rachelle L'Ecuyer, junior in special education, is one of about 25 lifeguards employed by Recreational Services.

This is her second year at the Natatorium, she said, and she works about 10 hours each week.

"Some days I'm just a lifeguard, and other days I'm the head guard," she said.

L'Ecuyer said the head guard is required to unlock the doors and get the computer ready.

"Basically, you're responsible for getting things ready for the day," she said.

The length of time a lifeguard has been employed at the Natatorium will determine whether he or she is required to cover a head guard shift.

"I have to get up at 5:30 on Monday mornings for my head guard shift," she said.

L'Ecuyer said she is paid $6.20 per hour for each lifeguard shift and $7 per hour for each head guard shift.

Four lifeguards rotate between four stations every 15 minutes, she said.

"There are three lifeguard stations and then the check-in station where we swipe the ID cards," she said. "And, hopefully, we each get a 15-minute break somewhere in there."

L'Ecuyer said she enjoys her job.

CAMPUS JOBS

The Collegian takes a closer look at students who earn their college cash on campus.

"It is very easy working here on campus. You can just go to class before or after work. The hours are very flexible.

"It's a pretty laid-back atmosphere. We may have one save each semester, if even that," she said.

L'Ecuyer said rescuing swimmers provides her with an adrenaline rush.

"Afterward, you're usually shaking. It is such a rush. It's an automatic reaction. You don't even think twice before jumping in the pool," she said.

The best aspect of the job is the people she interacts with daily, she said.

"One plus is that you get to know the patrons really well. They joke around with you, and that makes it a little more interesting," she said. "It's pretty much the same people that come in all the time."

She said she also likes her co-workers.

"My favorite part is getting to know my co-workers. We all get along really well. Some of us are friends outside of work, too," L'Ecuyer said.

Bethany Trogstad, junior in elementary education and family life and community service, is one of L'Ecuyer's co-workers.

She has worked at the Natatorium for three years and works about seven hours each week.

Trogstad said she likes her co-workers, too.

"I enjoy the numbers that come in here. It's such a wide variety – ranging from faculty, staff, students, alumni and retired citizens," Trogstad said.

She said she also likes the flexibility of the scheduling and other aspects of the job.

"I enjoy it because you get a workout along with that being part of your job," she said.

Along with lifeguarding, Trogstad teaches water aerobics at the Natatorium and works as a building supervisor at the Recreation Complex.

"I also work out at the Rec in my free time," she said.

L'Ecuyer said Recreational Services has in-services once each month to make sure the lifeguards are in shape.

"They make sure we are able to swim a 500, which is about 20 lengths or 10 laps of the pool. They also provide recertification, which is required every three years," she said.

Although she likes her job, L'Ecuyer said she wants to see more lifeguards on each shift.

"I would kind of like to see us have five guards on each shift instead of four, but because of budget cuts, we can't.

"That would make it a lot easier for us. Sitting at a stand for a long time gets tiring, and it is so warm in here," she said.

When she is not saving a swimmer, L'Ecuyer said she sometimes gets a little bored.

"You just kinda sit there and watch other people swim laps," she said.

UNDEFEATED AT HOME

Cats trample KU in home season streak

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It didn't take long for No. 5 K-State to put Kansas away Wednesday night and secure the fifth undefeated home season in program history.

Good thing, too.

Coach Deb Patterson had something else up her sleeve for the 10,702 fans at Bramlage Coliseum to see the Wildcats' regular season home finale.

Almost three months after handing the Jayhawks (10-15, 3-11) their worst loss in Sunflower Showdown history at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence, K-State (26-2, 13-1) came close to doing it again with an 80-57 win to cap off a perfect 18-0 home season.

"Those were quality opponents and real pressurized situations," Patterson said. "I look at this string they've put together and it's really tremendous. It's very appropriate that this group that's achieved so much during the last two seasons would be a part of setting this type of record."

Megan Mahoney led all scorers with 21 and three other Wildcats finished in double figures as the Wildcats extended their winning streak to eight games. Nicole Ohlde earned her 13th double-double of the season with 20 points and 12 rebounds.

But neither Mahoney nor Ohlde could supplant Laurie Koehn as Wednesday night's star.

After missing the Cats' last seven games and parts of three other contests this season with a right ankle/foot injury, Patterson called on the sophomore sharpshooter with K-State leading 36-17 with 4:24 to play in the first half.

"Obviously, I couldn't be anymore excited," Koehn said. "It's so much fun to get back on the floor with these guys."

That excitement might have been too much at first.

Koehn missed her only two shots of the first half – one a 3-point attempt from the left corner and another attempt from just inside the free-throw line – but those jitters didn't last long.

With the Cats maintaining a 48-32 second-half lead and 17:11 showing on the clock, Koehn spotted again from the right wing and drained her first official 3-pointer since Jan. 5.

All of Koehn's nine points would come from long range.

"It was outstanding. It's amazing to think that you can basically not play since December on any consistent level and certainly not practice and walk into a Big 12 game and drain three 3s," Patterson said.

Wednesday's contest also marked a resurgence in sophomore Kendra Wecker's play.

Plagued by slow starts in several of the Cats' recent contests, Wecker found her groove early against the Jayhawks and hit her first three shots on way to 16 points, including six from 3-point range.

"Any time you knock down the first shot you take, you're going to be thinking positive," Wecker said.

With Koehn back in the mix, that framework could return to normality soon, but one thing is for sure, Patterson said. A trip to Boulder to take on Colorado and start a two-game road trip to round out the Cats' regular season schedule should be a good gauge.

Sophomore guard Laurie Koehn scored nine points on three three-pointers in making her first appearance since missing seven games with an injury. The Wildcats defeated the Jayhawks 80-57, capping off their perfect 18-0 home season.

Women dominate by out-playing Jayhawks in almost every aspect of game

By David Skretta
K-STATE COLLEGIAN

On an errant K-State shot early in the second half, Kendra Wecker flew to the basket and stripped a Kansas rebounder to keep the ball alive.

Laurie Koehn then got a hand on it along the baseline, knocking it to the top of the key. Chelsea Domenico finally pounced on the loose ball, tumbling to the floor with two other Jayhawks.

That came with K-State already holding a 51-32 advantage with under 18 minutes to play. The game was virtually decided.

The Wildcats dominated Kansas on Wednesday by simply out-running, outfighting and out-hustling the overmatched Jayhawks.

"When we go out on the court, we're really wanting to come out aggressive and hustle after every loose ball," junior Nicole Ohlde said. "That's something that's important for us."

Playing a man-to-man defense most of the night, the Wildcats forced 17 Kansas turnovers. Those miscues led to a 21-6 advantage in points off turnovers, a carbon-copy of the Jan. 8 meeting which saw K-State score 25 off of 21 Kansas miscues.

Coach Deb Patterson was pleased with her team's first-half defensive effort but said there is plenty of room for improvement.

"We got a lot of deflections and really did a nice job of taking some penetration and passing lanes away for probably the first 15 minutes," Patterson said. "I didn't see a lot of that the rest of the game, and I think we need to be significantly better at that."

One thing the Wildcats can't get much better at is second-chance points. The Wildcats outscored Kansas 15-4 on the offensive glass.

"I felt great about our opportunities to create second-chance shots in segments of the game," Patterson said. "I thought Ohlde rebounded the ball extremely well. I don't think we rebounded as well as we're capable of, but I think Nicole did."

Rebounding also played a big factor in the face of the game on the defensive end.

"It's important for us trying to get our transition game going, and once we get a rebound, trying to outrun them and get it up the court," Ohlde said.

Despite being a post player, Ohlde

Baseball endures inside practices to improve on earlier games

Rebounding from losses won't be problematic

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Baseball would be a lot easier to play at K-State if the renovations to Frank Myers Field three years ago would have included a dome.

Coach Mike Clark and the K-State baseball team have been confined to the Brandeberry Indoor Complex this week as they prepare for another tournament this weekend.

"It's really tough to get consistency," Clark said. "We can throw to them in a cage and hit off a machine, but to read the movement on a breaking pitch and an off-speed pitch, it makes it very difficult.

"It's also really tough on the mind. You can't really simulate a baseball game, You know you're going to play Friday and on Monday, you've got snow on the ground, so you know you're going to be in Brandeberry for three days before you can get out and play."

The Cats (3-1) haven't played or practiced outdoors since a 10-7 loss to Illinois on Friday at the Service Academy Classic in Millington, Tenn. K-State's final two games of the tournament were canceled due to inclement weather.

Clark said he wished K-State could have played another game after picking up its first loss of the season.

"We're all not happy," he said. "We've got a bad taste in our mouth, and I can understand how a football coach feels. We played Friday and now we have to wait a whole week before we can play again.

Junior third basemen Ty Soto said that practicing indoors can cause any team problems. However, he said, if the team continues to work hard, it will be easy to overcome.

"It really just depends on the mindset of the team," he said.

"Coming in from Tennessee, Coach Clark knew that we probably wouldn't be able to get outside much this week. He tried his hardest to mentally prepare us for this week.

"We're lucky," he said, "because some people don't have the indoor facilities that we have. Outside you can benefit. If you have a negative mindset, you're probably not going to get much done. You can get a lot done team wise inside – working on plays, bunt coverages and hitting. We've got two cages in there so we can get a lot of hitting done."

A fairly young team, rebounding from a tough loss can be hard, but first baseman Tim Doty said he is confident K-State will be fine.

"We need to find our identity as a team," he said. "It's a new team with new guys around and we need to find our identity."

"We responded fine," Doty said. "We felt like we kind of lost the game a little bit ourselves. We didn't finish off the game. We didn't take it to them like we should have. We kind of sat back and gave them a lot of opportunities to get back in the game."

The law requiring equal opportunity for male and female athletes can be better enforced and explained, but the push to loosen the rules should be rejected, two dissenting members of a Title IX review study commission said Wednesday.

Their views, outlined in detail in their minority report, aim to counter a series of proposed changes in how colleges carry out the landmark anti-discrimination law.

Critics, building a campaign around actors, athletes and leading senators, hope to spur opposition from a nation of parents.

FURY BEHIND THE WHEEL

Consequences of road rage can include death, damage to vehicles

By Scot Gammill
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Flipping the bird. Blaring the horn. Riding someone's bumper. These situations all can be classified as road rage.

Anything can be the cause of road rage, and it is up to the person behind the wheel to determine if they are going to let something bother them so much that they are going to put other people in danger, said Jerome Overle, Little Apple Driving School owner.

"Most anything can set road rage off," Overle said. "It is mainly your mood and state of mind that will affect how you perform behind the wheel."

Brad Willie, driver's education teacher at Manhattan High School East Campus, said many things can contribute to having anger on the road.

"It's a combo of things that can contribute," Willie said. "Anxiety, frustration and fatigue are some of the main causes that I think cause road rage."

There is no common group that is prone to the problem, and anyone is able to have it at any given time.

"I'm on the street every day, and I see drivers driving aggressively," Overle said. "It can be males or females."

Road rage is preventable, Willie said.

"One thing that I see happen to people with road rage is, it seems to be that they are in a hurry to get somewhere, and that causes stress," Willie said.

"If people would plan things ahead of time and leave early, then that stress wouldn't be there."

Overle said he suggests that those who don't have road rage shouldn't antagonize those who do.

"If you see someone on that road that looks like they are stressed out and they are trying to get passed you, just tell them you are sorry," Overle said. "Indicating that might calm them down and get rid of their frustration."

Overle also shows a video to his students to help them deal with any road rage problems.

"I show them a video that gives them different situations and how to deal with it, and it shows what can happen," Overle said.

There are serious consequences when road rage is a cause of an accident.

"The most major problem is, of course, death," Willie said. "That is the worst result from a road rage accident."

Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department said there are several law violations that come with road rage.

"There isn't a specific law that deals with road rage, but a lot of accidents can result from it," Moldrup said.

"There can be damage, battery and a number of other things that start with rage and then end up being something you would regret later."

Willie said the key is to stay calm and relax.

"Try and laugh it off," Willie said. "That makes it difficult to get angry at different situations."

Local music veterans create new sound, develop reputation

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A stitched-together Frankenstein of Manhattan rock bands, Chicago 7, is trying to build a distinct reputation for itself.

Guitarist and vocalist Travis Edwards plays drums in Mankato. Guitarist Patrick Crough previously was the guitarist for Flybox. Drummer Paul White, senior in political science and mass communications, was the drummer for the Special Guests as well as Ruskabank. Bassist Chris Cossette, senior in Spanish, also plays bass for Pins and Needles.

Chicago 7
When: 9 p.m. Friday
Where: Dave's Hideaway
Cover: $3
Ages: 18 and over

The band is one of the prime examples of the complex inbred family trees that form within Manhattan music. So how's it feel to be the rookie? Guitarist Nolan Fabricius, freshman in graphic design, said it's not an issue.

"I kind of stumbled onto the situation, but I feel like the luckiest guy on Earth," he said. "They don't make me feel out of place. I hold my own, and I fit in perfectly."

The sound of the band is comprised of three guitars blaring a wall of sound at varying decibel levels led by Edwards' melodies backed by Crough's ability to scream. The result is a sort of heavy indie sound with traces of hardcore.

Crough said that while many of the band's influences are obscure, mid-1990s acts, they are common influences to many of the members.

"It's pretty progressive," he said. "There are a lot of songs over five minutes long. Some of the bands that really influenced the sound are Helmet, Far, Failure and Hum. It's stuff that no one listened to back then, but we did. We basically play rock."

Though Friday's show will be only the second time the band has performed, Crough said he is confident in the band's ability to give a good show. As for the previous work of the Chicago 7 lineup, Crough said it brings a high level of talent to the band.

"Everybody in this band is very musically gifted," he said. "We all had other projects we were doing to be playing something, and now everyone in the group is playing something they are happy playing.

"It's a positive environment, too. No one yells at each other, and there's no drama."

With three guitarists, the band offers a new experience for Crough, who previously managed all guitar duties with Flybox.

Crough said it is different, but it allows for more creativity.

"We write well together and pull off some single string guitar harmonies and things like that," he said. "It's cool to be in a band where what you hear in your head, you're able to put into a live application."

Though the band had its beginnings over a year ago when Crough and White started jamming together, Edwards joined the band about three months ago, and since then, he has written a majority of the band's material, Crough said.

Edwards, whose most recent work has been drumming in Mankato, said it's a change to be up front in a band, but he's getting used to it.

"We all feel connected," he said. "We're all friends, and it's kind of a family feeling with musicians in Manhattan. It's good that we mix and match. It makes the scene stronger and it gives bands more exposure."

For White, the band's music is a chance to work in a new direction.

"My other bands' styles of music were styles I liked and appreciated, but this is the first band I've played with in the last four or five years where I have a chance to be original with the songwriting process and drumming," he said. "I have the opportunity here to start from the ground up with song writing.

Anti-war protesters flood Senate with calls in 'virtual march'

Anti-war protesters traded marching shoes for phones, fax machines and computers Wednesday as part of a "virtual march" on the nation's capital.

Senators, regardless of their position on a war with Iraq, were barraged with calls, as was the White House. Outside calls to senate offices could not be completed because of busy circuits.

"We will let our fingers do the marching and demand that our voices be heard," said Tom Andrews, the national director for Win Without War, the group that organized the protest.

Andrews said that about 400,000 people had registered through the group's Web site for the call-in campaign.

"Well over 1 million phone calls were made in just eight hours by people from every state in the country" on Wednesday, he said.

"Every senator's office and the White House switchboard received at least two and often more calls per minute."

Grand jury begins investigation of nightclub fire; relatives bury victims

A grand jury opened an investigation Wednesday into the nightclub inferno that killed 97 people, and members of the heavy metal group whose pyrotechnics are suspected of starting the fire could testify as early as Thursday.

No one testified, and most of the session was devoted to preliminary talks between prosecutors and lawyers for the band, according to two sources close to the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

ELECTION
Official results will be available at 1 p.m. today

O'Hara, who received 59.5 percent of the vote, said he was glad to be able to share his success with his friends and supporters.

"Ultimately, it's all about having them here with us," O'Hara said. "They're a large part of our success for this primary victory."

Osborn, who received 24 percent of the vote, said she regretted that running mate Quackenbush was unable to join her for the celebration due to an internship interview in Chicago.

However, Osborn said that the situation was intense.

"I just had butterflies – I was surprised and excited," Osborn said. "I was just like 'thank goodness.'"

Threeton said the voter turnout was about average, but said the number could rise for the general elections because K-State's general election is early compared to area universities.

"A lot of people haven't warmed up to the fact that it's election season," Threeton said.

continue doing the same – going around and talking to students. We want to get out there and let students know what we're about – about our issues."

O'Hara said he thought the pair made it past the primaries because they're focusing on realistic issues that affect students.

He also said he thinks the pair's hard work and determination helped them.

"Travis and I have put a lot into this, and we have a vision to make this institution a better place. Hopefully the students did see that and will continue to see it," O'Hara said.

Stryker said winning isn't the only thing that's important to the pair.

"When we started at the beginning of our campaign, we wanted to make sure we were competitive, but most of all, we wanted to make sure we had fun," he said.

Stryker said hearing the results at Pat's allowed the pair to be surrounded by friends and supporters, which was important to him and O'Hara.

O'Hara said he knows the next week of campaigning isn't going to be easy with opponents like Osborn and Quackenbush.

"I've been extremely impressed with the campaign that Tammy Jo Osborn and Julie Quackenbush have run thus far," he said. "As far as this next week goes – it's going to be a battle, it's not going to be easy. But I really think that it's going to come down to the issues over the course of this next week.

"Travis and I are going to do our best to make students aware of our issues – of our initiatives, and we hope that students can relate to them," he said.

and campaigning before the general elections on March 4 and 5. Osborn said they will continue to address their four platform issues, including implementation of a student lobbying group, an online student portfolio, a new Wildcat Weekend orientation and a safety committee.

"All issues are an important facet to the university," Osborn said.

"We believe our issues are very forward-looking, and we'll continue to focus on issues that are already being addressed in Senate, like Dead Week."

Osborn said the next round of elections will be close, but the pair will be prepared with about seven years combined experience in student government.

"It will be a tough race both ways," she said.

"We have a great platform, plus experience and a desire to make a positive change and serve K-State students."

Osborn said she and Quackenbush hope more students will participate in next week's elections.

"It's a sad thing in a democracy when there is such a low percentage of voter turnout," she said. "A democracy needs to be strong, and that's why we go out and talk to students – to make sure their voice is heard."

After leaving the celebration, Osborn headed to the women's basketball game at Bramlage Coliseum. The break from elections didn't last long, however. Osborn will hit the campaign trail again today, visiting students in Salina and other campus organizations later this evening.

"We're going to campaign the same way we always have – talking to students and making sure their voice is heard," she said.

often found herself at the point in transition. Late in the first half, she took a Jayhawk one-on-one to the basket. As she penetrated, a cross-over spin move froze her opponent, leading to an uncontested finger-roll.

K-State converted 21 defensive boards into transition buckets, and the Cats outscored Kansas off the fast break, 16-4.

Numbers aside, the transition game also proved valuable in establishing early momentum.

Leading 12-6 at the 13:33 mark, a Domenico rebound turned into a transition 3-pointer by Kendra Wecker, sparking a 17-5 run that put K-State ahead 29-11.

Ohlde said the Wildcats look to out-hustle their opponents every time they hit the hardwood.

"I think that's just something we're trying to do," she said.

FOUNDATION | Organization suffering losses in weak market, continues to pursue goals

assigned purpose, and the money generated from that original gift is used to benefit whatever college, department or scholarship the donor chooses. The Foundation has contacted 1,300 donors to inform them of the current situation, suggesting that the donors give additional gifts to fulfill each endowment's mission until the market corrects itself and operation can return to normal, Hellebust said.

Each year, spending from an endowment is usually about 7 percent of the original gift. The Foundation is asking donors to contribute about 7 percent of their original gift to compensate for the poor market, Hellebust said.

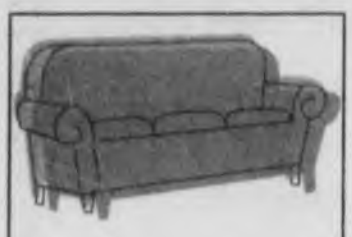
Overall, the response from donors has been positive, Hellebust said.

A state statute dictates that endowment organizations may not spend the original gifts, but may only spend money earned from the investment. Other states have been removing similar statutes, which Klug said is another possibility. But, he said, this could have negative effects.

"If we spend the principal," Klug said, "it will affect future generations. We need to keep in mind the long-term goals of the university."

But Hellebust said there is really only one solution to the Foundation's woes – for the stock market to recover.

The stock market has not fallen on times this hard since the Depression in the 1930s, Hellebust said. Although the economy is stronger now, the market is not in good shape.



The Foundation, however, is doing better than most.

Hellebust said the Foundation has been in the top quartile the past two years, and many endowment organizations were seeing losses in the double-digits.

Another bright spot in the bleak financial picture is that K-State has some of the most loyal donors, Julie Lea, communications director, said. The Telefund raised a record $1.4 million, and donors have been understanding and willing to help.

The most important thing, Klug said, is that the Foundation continue to pursue its goals.

"If the students go away, what good is a university?" Klug said. "We need to find a good balance so that when the economy recovers, we can maintain our level of excellence."

K-State professor involved in World Trade Center redesign

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Robert Arens was shocked.

He had given up nearly all hope before he heard the news.

But at 7 p.m. Wednesday night, Arens learned that a design had been chosen for the site of the World Trade Center – a design he was involved with.

Arens, associate professor of architecture, was part of Berlin architect Daniel Libeskind's team, which submitted a proposal for new construction on the World Trade Center site in New York.

A headline in the New York Times said the site planning committee had supported the THINK team's proposal, the other of the two finalists.

"I thought all was lost," Arens said.

But the official announcement relieved Arens of his disappointment.

"I was completely stunned," he said. "It's going to take a couple days to realize what has happened."

The design was chosen by the Lower Manhattan Development Corp. and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey.

Student TV show to air

'Manhattan Matters' set to show tonight

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan will finally get a local news show, and the show's producer said he hopes it will be a fresh approach.

The first episode of "Manhattan Matters" will air at 8:30 tonight on channel 8. The show will be 30 minutes long.

"This week we will focus on why we are doing the show," said Bambi Landholm, visiting assistant professor in journalism and mass communications.

There is definitely a need for local news in Manhattan, she said.

"Obviously, we're lacking it through the TV medium. We don't have a station that would focus its attention on Manhattan – one that targets our local community.

"Topeka stations will come to Manhattan when big news breaks, but other than that, we are not their target audience," she said.

Landholm said tonight's episode will feature interviews conducted by Lori Bergen, assistant professor in journalism and mass communications. The guests will be Steve Smethers and Tom Grimes, both professors in journalism.

"We are kind of excited about the first show because we are going to de-mystify TV," Landholm said.

She compared "Manhattan Matters" to "Saturday Night

Funds to benefit foreign students

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student senators discussed ways to increase scholarship support for international students Thursday night.

A resolution to support the Global Education Initiative passed with a 46-2-0 vote. The resolution includes an appropriation of about $1.70 per student per semester toward the Global Education Initiative.

The Global Education Initiative funds scholarship support for international education. The money will provide scholarships for 100 students, as well as fill one graduate teaching assistant position.

"We're trying to show our administration that their students support international students," Cook said. "It is not an increase in privilege fee, but letting the administration know this is where we want to see our money going."

A portion of the $1.70 also will provide international students with shuttle transportation from Kansas City International Airport to Manhattan.

Governmental Relations Director David McCandless said the shuttle transportation

World leaders express varied views of war

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite President Bush's readiness for war, the prospect of another Middle Eastern conflict makes many world leaders uncomfortable. Some feel Bush should give Iraq more time to comply with U.N. weapons inspectors and their demands, and some are outwardly opposed to any military action.

Those who dissent with Bush's opinion, however, are unlikely to stop him, said Scott Tollefson, assistant professor of political science.

"I don't think any opposition is going to stop a U.S. strike against Iraq," he said. "We're there, and we're going to take action. People can and should protest military action if they're against it, but right now, it's not a question of whether we will attack, but when."

Tollefson said he doubts the United States will call for a vote on its new U.N. resolution, which will officially say that Saddam Hussein's time is up, until they are sure it will receive the nine votes necessary in the Security Council. However, he doubts any members will exercise their veto power.

The U.N. Security Council will hear a report from Chief Weapons Inspector Hans Blix on March 7. That resolution would make it internationally acknowledged that Saddam is in violation of a U.N. order to disarm.

Following is a brief description of some key players' stances and an explanation of those stances.

After four weeks of working out, shaping up and cooling down, Cara Shufelberger can meet the sandman a little earlier each night.

"I'm sleeping a lot better," she said. "I've been going to bed earlier the past few days and just feel better all around."

Shufelberger visits fitness consultants once a week at the Wellness Resource Center as part of its Spring Break Training Program.

Fitness Consultant Tiffany Bullard, junior in nutrition and exercise, said Shufelberger has done well, keeping a positive attitude since she began the program.

"She's pretty much meeting all the requirements of the different food groups," Bullard said. "Her fat intake is much closer to where she needed to be this week."

Shufelberger said she began keeping a seven-day record of the different food groups she had consumed in addition to her normal three-day log.

Bullard said the food record is a way to train

Freshman 15: just a myth?

By Jessica Packard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Whether freshmen are destined to gain 15 pounds during their first year of college is questionable to many people.

Mickaela Bonnewell, freshman in secondary education, said the freshman 15 is a myth.

"I think it's blown out of proportion because times have changed," Bonnewell said.

"We're a different society compared to when my parents went to school."

Bonnewell said she has lost weight since she has been at K-State because of her decrease in appetite and increase in exercise.

"Whether or not you gain weight depends on you and your lifestyle," Bonnewell said.

Barbara Brooks, a registered dietitian and unit director for Van Zile Dining Center, said the dining centers offer students variety in the decisions they make for their meals.

"There are a variety of choices a student has when eating at the dining center," Brooks said.

"Students want choices, so we provide them with options."

Brooks said eating healthy is up to the student

"Can you gain 15 pounds eating at the dining center? Yes. Do you have to? No," Brooks said.

Although meals are provided for students, Brooks said exercise is necessary to maintain or lose weight.

Brooks said many students have a problem with their weight because their activities have changed since high school.

"It's the decrease in exercise that makes students gain weight," Brooks said.

Campus Connection

Some of the issues that affect campuses around the United States also affect K-State. Read each Friday about an issue that K-State faces along with another campus.

K-State students pay student privilege fees that include Recreational Services. Raydon Robel, director of Recreational Services, said the services costs about $33.60 per student each semester.

Robel said 3,500 or more people visit the Rec complex a day, 90 percent of which are students.

"This speaks very well for K-State and its participation," Robel said.

Brooks said in the end, it comes down to what students choose.

"The choices are there, but it's the students' decision," Brooks said.

Dining centers offer balance

By Bethany Lee
WASHINGTON STATE DAILY EVERGREEN

PULLMAN, Wash. - Is the Freshman 15 a myth or a sure thing? Dining centers offer nutritious food as well as not-as-healthy alternatives.

At the Rotunda Dining Center there is a salad bar and sandwich station. There's also a pizza station and grill.

Since most freshmen are required to live in the residence halls, it is convenient to have a meal plan at one of the three local dining centers; Regents, Rotunda, and Wilmer-Davis. Rarely does a student opt to cook a healthy meal every night.

Student tuition includes a pass to the Rec Center, at the price of $115 per semester. Sharae Randall, marketing coordinator at the Rec Center, said about 3,300 students visit the Rec Center every day.

Dining center dietitian Hsiu-Pow Hwang believes exercising is not the only important factor in maintaining a healthy lifestyle.

"For students at the university, it's very important that they have adequate nutrition, balanced with all the nutrients like calciums," Hwang said.

According to a new survey of nearly 25,000 freshmen at 109 four-year universities, students spend less time on volunteer work and exercise in college than in high school.

If students want to lose weight, they should not skip meals, Hwang said.

"If they try to lose weight, eat more amounts of fruit, but small meals more frequently," she said.

Some students feel limited to the dining centers by their assigned meal plan, yet Hwang said the dining centers offer a variety of options.

"We try to provide variety and we do have some high items like chicken strips and french fries," Hwang said. "We also have salad bars and deli meat, so to me, it's how you balance."

Dead Week up for vote

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The ongoing Dead Week debate may soon be laid to rest.

Faculty Senate's Academic Affairs Committee will vote on a provision Tuesday afternoon that will extend the test-free week by two days and, if approved, send the measure to Faculty Senate on March 11.

Tanner Klingzell, senior in finance and student faculty senate representative, said the provision will help restore the original idea of Dead Week.

"There has always been frustrations among students during the week before finals," he said. "The intent behind the revision is with finals being the most important week of the semester, there should be time just allocated to studying hard and preparing for finals instead of having two quizzes a paper and a test that week."

Klingzell said Student Senate requested an extension of Dead Week in December. "Basically, we're trying to get the wording correct so it's more clear," he said. "Right now, it's really unclear to a lot of teachers and professors. Once it's all set, it should be a good compromise."

Jackie Spears, chair of the academic affairs committee, said the current Dead Week policy, passed in March 1990, prohibits faculty from giving tests during the five calendar days before the beginning of final exam week.

Since finals begin on Monday, professors technically may give tests on the Monday and Tuesday before finals.

"The provost and president believe when the policy was first put in place, final exam week began on Saturday instead of Monday," Spears said. Spears said that although the date for finals week was changed, there was no date change for Dead Week.

"Student Senate requested we revise the policy, that no exams be given in the seven calendar days prior to the beginning of final exam week," she said. "By doing that, Dead Week will be moved back to Monday."

Klingzell said Student Senate may also request that the provisions include papers,

Telefund exceeds previous record

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Telefund 2003 marked its 24th anniversary, as well as its 24th year to set a record for either dollars pledged, number of donors or both, said Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving and Telefund.

Dowell said that this year there were 21,221 donors and $1,403,303 pledged overall. He said 1,660 students volunteered during the event's 24-night run. During about 10 of those nights, volunteers were turned away because the 86 phones supplied were already being used, he said.

"It's terrific and unfortunate at the same time," Dowell said. "The interest has grown to the extent that it has become a standing-room only situation."

Dowell said that although Telefund 2003 missed its $1.4 million goal by $7,000, a late gift of $10,000 carried the campaign past that goal.

The gift was given by Christine Chalender, who used her gift to set up a scholarship in honor of her late husband, Bob Chalender.

Dowell said Christine Chalender was a former Telefund caller for the College of Human Ecology and wanted to help what she called an "established and successful program" reach its goal.

Dowell, who has been involved with Telefund for about 12 years, said the main differences of Telefund 2003 from previous Telefunds was the economic challenges and international turmoil donors faced.

"Considering the economic and geopolitical challenges facing our nation, the success of Telefund 2003 is absolutely amazing," he said. "The pledge and participation totals speak volumes of alumni pride, student leadership and generous support from the community."

At the bash, four grand prizes, including a Nissan Frontier truck, a $1,000 scholarship, a Coleman package, will be given away.

In addition, more than 100 randomly selected participants will be awarded $250 scholarships funded by the Parent's Telefund scholarship program in which callers ask family members to donate money. The program raised $35,374 in addition to the $1.4 million raised overall.

TO THE POINT

Faculty Senate should reform Dead Week

A Faculty Senate committee has Dead Week on its agenda, and it is now time to put to rest a debate that has long been criticized by students.

The current policy states that professors may not give exams five calendar days before Finals Week. This outdated policy does not, however, prohibit professors from giving exams on Monday and Tuesday.

Faculty Senate needs to require Dead Week to truly be a dead week. This includes Student Senate's requests to have no papers, quizzes or projects due as well.

A Faculty Senate representative expressed concern on how students would use the extra time. This should not be an issue. Dead Week is not just a week with less work. It is a week that provides time for students to recuperate both physically and emotionally before Finals Week.

Students are at an age where they can make their own study schedules. It is not for the faculty to decide how students use their time. It is, though, the faculty and university's job to provide the best environment in which students can achieve academically.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Paul Restivo is in a frat? Wow. Didn't know that. And I thought that his misogynistic, quasi-racist opinions actually came from him. Go figure.

If Saddam Hussein does not comply with G-dubs' requests, we need to go to Iraq and accomplish complete Saddamination.

Dan Rather has the biggest balls in America.

How come when a girl is promiscuous, it's cool, but when a guy is, it's wrong and he's called a slut? Oh, wait a second. I flipped that around.

Martha Stewart should do a show on how to color coordinate your duct tape window linings to your five-piece living room set.

Here's an idea. Don't waste valuable Fourum space with pointless SUV drawings.

Why don't all the potheads line up so we can hit them in the head with a baseball bat? It would be a lot more effective and faster.

By the way, I bet if a drunk driver killed your mom or daughter or roommate, or somebody you cared about, I bet you'd cough up that extra five bucks a semester. Stop being so selfish. SafeRide benefits everyone.

I smoked every day when I was in the dorms. Van Zile was awesome.

Breaking news: Mary Poppins is still a junkie.

I bet you Lana Oleen would support a SafeRide system.

THE GIFT OF LIFE

Columnist reveals 'life's greatest lessons' following recent 25th birthday

ANGEL WILSON

I celebrated my 25th birthday on Sunday.

It was indeed a momentous occasion. Not merely because I can finally move into the clubs where "kids" aren't allowed or because my car insurance will be going down soon.

What made this year's birthday special was the fact that it happened. Yep, my birthday was a wondrous event merely because it happened.

See, unlike a lot of you, I realize that life is my greatest gift. I have never been the type to get sad or down because of the impending doom that some associate with birthdays. It gives me a chance to be thankful and appreciative of all the things that have led me to where I am now. It provides explanation to my personality, as well as my entire being, which is definitely not an easy thing to define.

To give you further insight into the joy which is me, I'll let you in on a secret: everything in my life is governed by the Yoruba proverb, "if we stand tall it is because we stand on the backs of those who came before us."

If you ever wanted to know the secret to my happiness, to my zest, that is it. There are no special vitamins and minerals, prescription medicines or herbal supplements – just the power that I receive from the ancestors and my elders.

"What do you mean 'power from the ancestors and elders?'" some of you might ask. I'll explain it to you.

In plenty of African traditions and religions, it is with great respect and admiration that we pay homage to those who have paved the way for us.

This translates into the heroes we believe are important. This includes, but is not limited to, deceased family members, friends, activists, leaders, kings, queens, warriors, etc.

The ancestors guide us in ways only understandable to those with the strongest faith. No, the ancestors are not a substitution for God, Allah, Jah, Yahweh or any other religious deity. We don't worship our ancestors, we venerate them.

And in case you're wondering, according to Merriam-Webster that means, "to regard with reverential respect or with admiring deference."

It is from the ancestors and elders that I have learned some of life's greatest lessons:

You can play dumb, but you can't play smart.

Go ahead and cry – Jesus wept, too.

A whupping may last a minute, but a parent's disappointment is forever.

Always document the conversations you have with people you work with and for.

Don't be afraid to look people in the eye.

If you back down from a fight on the street, you'll have a bigger fight waiting for you once you get home.

Don't be afraid to ask for something – all someone can do is say no.

When making salmon croquettes, don't forget the corn meal.

It's important to read books without pictures.

Reading one book a week is not impossible, as long as it's interesting.

Even if you have no money, always get your mother something for Christmas.

Don't be afraid to sleep in a dead relative's room – they are the last person that would want to hurt you.

You might not like all your relatives, but they're still family.

Keep track of your baby pictures – they tell an important story.

Always send thank-you cards for graduation and birthday gifts.

Be a person of your word.

Appreciate all birthdays – think about how many people didn't live to see their next one.

I am continuously grateful for the people, places and things I have experienced in my lifetime. Without guidance, I would not be the person I am. Because of my respect for those who have come before me, I don't ever have to wonder if anyone is looking out for me. I know they are. Ase!

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Columnist ignorant in criticism of Confederate flag; Southern symbol represents more than stereotypical image of bigotry

Editor,

Lindsey Praechter began her Tuesday editorial by calling those who display the Confederate flag ignorant and guilty of supporting a symbol of slavery. However, the only ignorance that I could see was Praechter's own in her failure to fully realize and discuss the vast historical significance of the Confederate flag beyond its archetypical categorizing of bigotry.

Flags represent many things to many people. The infamous Confederate battle flag causes intense feelings in Americans that range from Southern pride to utter disgust, but the fact that this nearly 150-year-old reminder of the Civil War may repulse and anger some does not warrant its consignment to an obscure page in a history textbook.

Confederate soldiers fought and died just as Union soldiers did, and just because one doesn't agree with their cause doesn't mean their deaths cannot be regretted. The Confederate flag that we are most familiar with was simply a battle flag, at times carried into battle with Confederate soldiers.

Furthermore, the Civil War was about independence, the Constitution and economic competition more than it ever was about slavery.

A symbol, much like beauty, is simply in the eye of the beholder.

To most Americans, the flag represents freedom and prosperity. Can that same flag not represent treason and deception to a bitter British citizen or strike fear and hatred in the heart of an Iraqi?

Voters in Georgia will likely recertify support for their current flag with its depiction of the Confederate emblem, just as voters in Mississippi overwhelmingly voiced approval for their flag featuring the Confederate battle flag in its upper left corner.

A more important issue arises when activists begin calling for the Confederate flag to be banned – the issue of the First Amendment to the Constitution.

It guarantees the right to freedom of speech, which includes the displaying of symbolism. Our great Constitution protects the rights of protesters to burn American flags, and it protects the rights of K-State professors who display their "No Iraq War" posters proudly in their windows.

Pride and hatred of all kinds is protected in this country, and as long as we live under the stars and stripes, anyone has the right to fly the stars and bars.

invade Iraq, but he wants it.

Bush's stance is that Iraq is developing weapons of mass destruction and is not cooperating with weapons inspectors. This means Iraq is not fulfilling obligations under U.N. resolutions that warn of consequences for failure to comply.

To get international acknowledgement that Iraq is in violation of a U.N. order to disarm, nine of the 15 Security Council members must pass a resolution introduced Monday. This will be a green light for the Bush administration to use military force in Iraq.

He has also challenged the United Nations' relevancy as an international governing body by arguing that if the Security Council fails to enforce previous resolutions, then there is no justification for its existence.

Bush: "The security of our nation and the hope of millions depend on us, and Americans do not turn away from duties because they are hard."
– Feb. 25 speech

Great Britain

Prime Minister Tony Blair is ready to back a U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, but he's having a hard time convincing everyone else in his country to agree.

Blair is an advocate of invading Iraq under the approval of the Security Council, but he has indicated he would join U.S. action without that approval. Blair and his officials agree that Iraq is not cooperating and that the time is coming for the use of military force.

Unfortunately for Blair, dissenters that make up about one-third of Parliament, including many from his own Labour party, voted to amend a motion, making war a last resort.

Blair: "We hope this can be resolved peacefully and without conflict. But in the end, I can't avoid it unless Saddam chooses the route of peaceful disarmament."

France

President Jacques Chirac stands firm that war is unnecessary.

Chirac has expressed that U.N. weapons inspections are working and that a second U.N. resolution is "neither useful nor necessary," according to a Chirac spokeswoman. Instead, France proposed a memorandum to the Security Council on Monday in league with Germany and Russia. The memorandum supports reinforced inspections until Iraq is peacefully disarmed.

The memorandum proposed setting specific deadlines since Iraq cannot be allowed to violate Security Council resolutions indefinitely.

Chirac has overwhelming support from his country. He has been outspokenly critical of countries cooperating with the United States' war agenda, such as Turkey and Great Britain.

CNN reporter Jim Bittermann: "No matter how the French president may be vilified in the United States, at home his insistence that U.N. arms inspectors should have time to do their job is enormously popular."
– cnn.com

Germany

Gerhard Schroeder doesn't want Germany involved in war, no matter who goes.

By banding together with Russia and France, Schroeder has helped form a coalition of powerful nations that oppose a war in Iraq. Even if the Security Council authorizes action against Iraq, German officials have said the country will not be involved.

Schroeder said that since Germany has the second most peacekeeping troops in the United Nations, it has the right to disagree with the U.S. stance on Iraq.

Schroeder: "Whoever wants to settle this problem by military means must consider whether it advances the interests of an international alliance of 50 or more nations, many Muslim, or whether it will disturb and perhaps destroy this alliance."
– cnn.com

Russia

President Vladimir Putin has indicated he is against war, but doesn't want to upset U.S. relations.

Putin sent former Russian Prime Minister Yevgeny Primakov to Iraq to meet with Saddam on Sunday. Primakov's visit was to impress upon Saddam the importance of his compliance with U.N. resolution 1441, the order that he disarm or suffer consequences.

Russian U.N. Ambassador Sergei Lavrov said he doesn't believe the U.S.-proposed resolution will receive the required nine votes.

Still, U.S. diplomats feel it is unlikely that Russia will use its Security Council veto power. Instead, they expect Russia, as well as China, to abstain from the vote.

Lavrov: "(Our main goal is) not to allow a war which we believe is unjustified."

Iraq

Saddam is trying to prevent the obliteration of his regime.

In a recent interview with Dan Rather, excerpts of which can be found on www.cnn.com, Saddam said he has no missiles that violate the arms limitation put upon him by post-Gulf War U.N. resolutions. The United Nations has imposed a 93-mile limit to all Iraqi missiles, and Saddam claims the Al Samoud 2 missiles do not violate that.

Saddam has said Iraq will consider destroying the missiles, but Saturday is the deadline for him to begin.

Saddam Hussein: "We do not have missiles that go beyond the prescribed range."
– cnn.com

U.N. Weapons Inspectors

The inspectors have no sway in whether an invasion will occur, but Blix and Mohamed El-Baradei, another diplomat leading inspections, still have expressed opinions.

Blix has said he would like inspections to continue, as Iraq is making slow but sure progress in working with weapons inspectors. In an interview with German magazine Der Spiegel, ElBaradei said that concessions are coming, but the inspectors are "still in no way fully satisfied."

Blix has issued a Saturday deadline for Iraq to begin destroying its Al Samoud 2 missiles, and he will give an updated report to the Security Council on March 7.

U.N. Security Council

The permanent members of the council are the United States, Great Britain, China, France and Russia. Elected members include Angola, Cameroon, Chile, Guinea, Pakistan, Syria, Spain, Bulgaria, Germany and Mexico.

K-State set to honor 13

All-Century team to be recognized during halftime

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mike Evans, Rolando Blackman and Lon Kruger will be there.

So will Bob Boozer, Ernie Barrett and possibly Mitch Richmond.

Maybe even the retro throw-back jerseys will find their way into Saturday's festivities, Coach Jim Wooldridge said, as K-State will recognize 13 legendary players and coaches as part of the Wildcat All-Century team.

K-State (12-14, 3-10) vs. Missouri (17-7, 8-5)
When: 12:45 Saturday
Where: Bramlage Coliseum (13,340)

It will be a history-filled ceremony when all are on the court during halftime of K-State's game against Missouri (17-7, 8-5), Wooldridge said.

"They all hold importance with me – each and every one of them," he said.

Wooldridge said the team will get to spend time with each of the legends in an effort to connect the players of today with K-State's tradition.

After some meet-and-greet early in the day, the Cats will get down to business.

Missouri, coming off a big win at home against No. 3 Oklahoma, comes to Manhattan as winner of four of its last six games.

The cornerstone of the Tigers' offense, center Arthur Johnson, will be the focal point of K-State's defensive effort, Matt Siebrandt said.

"He's a tough matchup," he said.

"He's playing right up there with (Nick) Collison – they're one, two. It will be a physical matchup, something that we'll have to try to contain."

Missouri might have to put its focus on containing K-State's top big man as well.

Siebrandt had scored in double-figures for the Wildcats in nine straight games before his eight-point effort against Nebraska on Tuesday.

K-State's senior was also one of the players that had success against Missouri on Feb. 15 in Columbia. Siebrandt had 14 points on five-of-10 shooting.

Eight of the 10 players on the All-Century team are expected to be there.

Steve Henson will not be in attendance at the game, and Mitch Richmond's homecoming celebration is still up in the air, K-State Sports Information said.

Siebrandt said he hopes Richmond can make it back, but added he would rather the throw-back jerseys stay in the locker room.

"I'll wear them to honor the All-Century team, but I think those things saw the one time they needed to be out," he said.

No. 5 K-State (26-2, 13-1) vs. Colorado (20-5, 10-4)
When: 8 p.m., Saturday
Where: Coors Event Center (11,064) — Boulder, Colo.

To say No. 5 K-State is in for a change Saturday when it travels to Boulder, Colo., might be an understatement.

After facing teams in the lower half of the Big 12 standings in five of their last six contests, the Wildcats (26-2, 13-1) will see a Colorado (20-5, 10-4) team looking for quality wins to help its case for a favorable NCAA seeding.

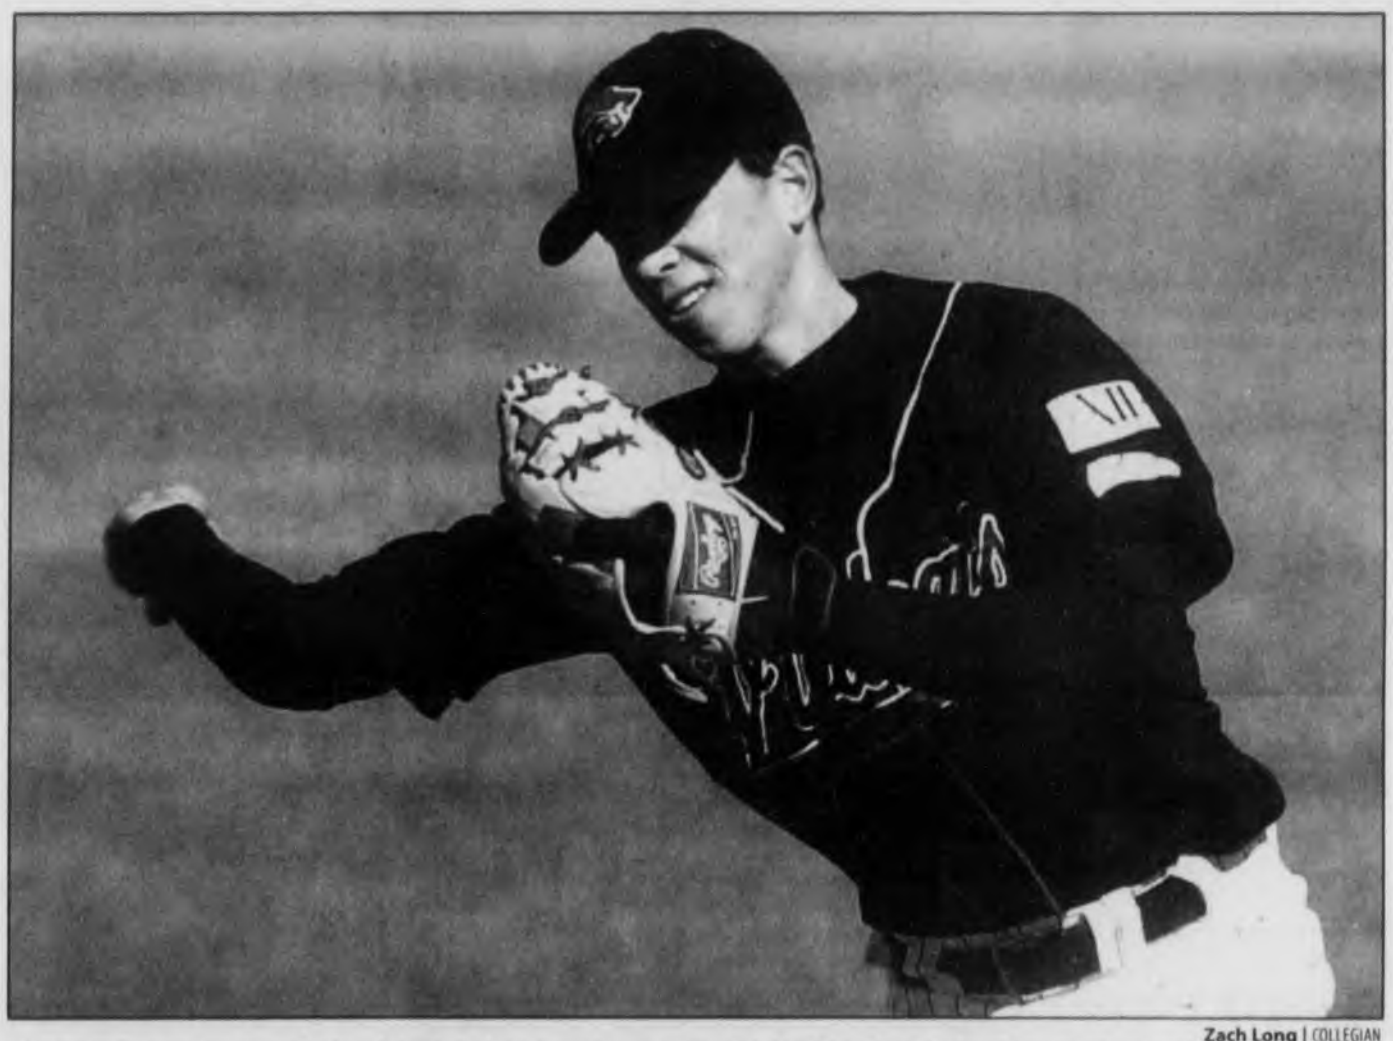
CU's three seniors will be honored before Saturday's 8 p.m. tip.

The Wildcats were Colorado's Senior Night opponent last season in a game that didn't play out the way K-State would have liked.

The Buffaloes jumped out to a 10-0 lead last March, forced 22 turnovers and limited the Cats to 12 first-half points on their way to a 79-58 win.

K-State whipped Colorado 61-36 earlier this season on Jan. 11, but the Buffs' struggles in that contest won't be what K-State will be thinking about come Saturday, Patterson said.

Three players – Sabrina Scott, Linda Lappe and Tera Bjorkland – are major reasons why CU will have a first-round bye in the league tournament.



"They're bringing momentum into that game," Patterson said. "It's a very significant challenge anytime you're on the road in the Big 12, but when you play the upper-tier teams, it's an even greater challenge."

Baseball travels to meet unfamiliar opponent

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four innings of baseball just aren't enough.

That's where K-State (3-1) fell apart last week against Illinois. Jared Bunn had a no-hitter heading into the fifth inning and then struggled. The offense was on top of its game until the fourth inning and then went dormant.

Coach Mike Clark said he hopes to see the Wildcats play complete games during the Wiregrass Classic in Dothan, Ala. The Cats play Temple today at 2:30 p.m., followed by Troy State at 3 p.m. Saturday before finishing the tournament with Northwestern at 11 a.m. on Sunday.

"Two things happened," Clark said. "One, we got a little complacent. We had a chance to put them away early and only came up with four runs. On the other side of it, we got complacent on the pitching side of it, sitting with a no-hitter going into the fifth inning, and then we made three big mistakes, and all of a sudden it's a 4-4 ballgame.

"You can't just show up," Clark said. "We put ourselves in tough situations. It's really important that we stay focused throughout the whole ballgame."

Clark will send Kevin Melcher (0-0, 5.40 ERA) to the mound against Temple today. Melcher struggled in his first outing against Western Illinois, allowing two runs off four hits Feb. 16.

Melcher said he had a few mechanical problems and feels confident heading into his second start.

"Ever since the first start, we've been working on getting rid of the rough edges," he said. "I wasn't really sound pitching-wise. Coach (Mike) Hensley and I have been trying to smooth me out and make pitching less difficult for me. I'm just going to go out there and concentrate on hitting my spots."

This will be Temple's first game, making it tough for Melcher to prepare.

"When you pitch against a team that you've never faced before, sometimes it's kind of learn as you go," he said. "Every team gets new guys, and if they haven't played a game yet, it's tough to get a scouting report."

Following Melcher, K-State will use Jim Ripley (1-0, 1.80 ERA) on Saturday and freshman Jared Bunn (1-0, 6.97 ERA) on Sunday.

Clark said a scouting report would not benefit him much. Early in the season, everything lies on K-State's shoulders.

"We don't know anything about them, and they probably don't know a whole lot about us," Clark said. "We have to go out and play our game."

Tennis team finds positives in loss, looks to rebound before Big 12 opener

K-State drops one spot in polls, set to face 'dangerous' Texas Tech

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Even in defeat, Coach Steve Bietau saw signs of life.

K-State, now 4-1, lost to No. 40 Mississippi on Saturday 5-2. With the loss, the Cats dropped one spot to No. 59.

"We're always disappointed when we lose," Bietau said. "We had some definite bright spots as well."

The Cats' brightest came from sophomore Maria Rosenberg and freshman Jessica Simosa, both of whom remained undefeated in singles play this season.

Bietau also knows his squad has work to do before beginning Big 12 play at home Saturday against 1-3 Texas Tech at noon in Ahearn Field House.

"We need to get more people competing well at the same time," Bietau said. "There were some opportunities in our match we weren't able to capitalize on. It's more of an attitude thing than it is a tennis issue."

K-State will enter the weekend on a five-match winning streak against the Lady Raiders, something that is meaningless to Bietau.

"We know Tech pretty well," he said. "We saw them at Arizona State last fall. They're a team that has been near the bottom of the conference standings, but they're also pretty dangerous.

"They also have at least a couple of players returning that have had a lot of success against good competition."

The doubles team of junior Irina Tereschenko and senior Beverly Dawson, ranked No. 41 in the nation, sport a 13-3 overall record and a 1-1 record in conference play.

"It's a Big 12 opponent, it's a home match, and we're coming off a match where I hope our kids feel they have something to prove," Bietau said.

"I'm looking forward to taking another step in becoming the team we want to be."

NFL | Cowboys cut Smith

Emmitt Smith, the leading rusher in NFL history, was released Thursday after 13 seasons with the Dallas Cowboys.

Smith said he's not ready to retire.

He was released to make way for a younger, cheaper running back for the Cowboys, who have been 5-11 for the last three seasons. It's the first major roster shakeup since Bill Parcells took over as coach, although owner Jerry Jones has made it clear it was his decision.

SIMPLE BARE NECESSITIES

"The Jungle Book 2" offers little entertainment for adult viewers

"THE JUNGLE BOOK 2"

★ ★ ☆ ☆ ☆

Movie review by Wendy Gorman

At least it made my roommate cry.

Though nothing to write home about, "The Jungle Book 2" does have some high points.

The sequel picks up where the first movie left off, in the village where Mowgli (voiced by Haley Joel Osment) ended up after leaving the jungle. Mowgli has befriended Shanti, the pretty girl who lured him out of the jungle at the closing of the original film, but seems a bit uncomfortable with village life.

Meanwhile, Mowgli's old friend, the bear Baloo (John Goodman) misses the boy fiercely. Against the wishes of the wise panther Bagheera (Bob Joles), Baloo ventures into the village and brings Mowgli back to the jungle. Shanti follows Mowgli, thinking he is in grave danger.

Of course, Mowgli's old feline nemesis, Shere Kahn (Tony Jay), comes around to hunt him.

The whole crew cavorts around the jungle for a while, and Mowgli is ultimately faced with the difficult question of where he truly belongs. At this juncture, I noticed my companion had tears streaming down her cheeks.

As far as Disney movies go, "The Jungle Book 2" was pretty run-of-the-mill. The humor is strictly kid-friendly. Unfortunately, the writers did not slip in any subtle adult humor that older viewers would appreciate, a la "Shrek" or "Monster's, Inc."

Probably the biggest disappointment, however, was the absence of the type of showstopping musical numbers Disney's animated films usually deliver. Though "Bare Necessities" was revived for the sequel, it loses some of its flavor the second time around. The movie lacks the visually rich, musically original scenes like "Be Our Guest" from "Beauty and the Beast" or "The Little Mermaid's" "Under the Sea."

On a high note, the unique characters give the movie a few kicks. The hapless boa constrictor is back, and he elicits roughly 80 percent of the show's laughs. Tony Jay gives a bone-chilling performance as Shere Kahn in a beautifully smooth, menacing tone. Phil Collins even lends his voice to a hilariously oblivious vulture named Lucky.

The smattering of children in the audience certainly loved the movie, yelling with Shanti's baby brother, laughing at Baloo's antics and gasping in awe of the tiger.

If it can reduce a 20-year-old girl (albeit a self-confessed softie) to a sniffling mess, "The Jungle Book 2"

Great acting dominates screen in fraternity-spoof "Old School"

"Old School," is a movie of archetypes, playing to the strengths of the three stars: Luke Wilson, Will Farrell and Vince Vaughn.

The always-languid Wilson has his best performance since 1996's "Bottle Rocket," as Mitch.

Vaughn plays "Beanie," the over-the-top buddy who winds up just being trouble, i.e. "Clay Pigeons," "Swingers" and "Domestic Disturbance."

"OLD SCHOOL"

★ ★ ★ ★ ☆

Movie review by Tony Herrman

Ferrell's performance, however, is incendiary. His character, Frank, is more low key than his memorable role in "Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back," but twice as funny.

The premise of the movie is that Mitch's buddies help him attract women after he leaves his sexually deviant girlfriend, Heidi, played by Juliette Lewis. When Mitch gets a house near the local campus, Beanie and Frank throw a "freedom fest" for him.

Newly married "Frank the Tank" spends the whole movie on a bender, after his wife kicks him out of the house because she finds him streaking down Main Street following too many bonged beers at Mitch's party.

The next day, Dean Pritchert, played by Jeremy Piven, tells Mitch and Beanie that Mitch's house has been zoned for campus use.

To avoid losing the house, Mitch reluctantly starts a fraternity. Some of the funniest moments in the movie are those when Frank goes overboard with the mental torment of the fraternity's hazing activities.

Even the supporting cast members of "Old School" plays to their strengths.

Andy Dick plays a fellatio expert who, while teaching Frank's wife, is attacked by Frank.

Craig Kilborn, of University of Minnesota basketball fame, is Mark, a foppish playboy who gets caught by Mitch cheating on his crush, Nicole, played by the ubercute Ellen Pompeo.

Even the movie's director, Todd Phillips, has a humorous – albeit tasteless – cameo as the gang-bang guy.

Although, "Old School" tends to suffer from the same formulaic writing and contrived gags as any movie about college. The fraternity members get in trouble with the conniving dean for their crazy shenanigans, and they have to dig themselves out of a hole by passing outlandish tests. Isn't that the plot of all of the "Revenge of the Nerds" movies?

Most of Nicole's jokes leave the audience wondering, "was that supposed to be funny?"

Like any red-blooded-American comedy, "Old School" nods to corporate-rock classics like Styx and Kansas.

Despite the movie's shortfalls, its three stars have each brought an amazing performance to the screen.

This movie is not worth the $7 for a ticket, but rather $21 for tickets to see the show three times.

While the credits run, "Old School's" epilogue ties up all lose ends in a way that is true to character, and once again, Ferrell shines.

Grammy winners more deserving; award nominations still biased

JJ DUNCAN

At least this year, the Grammys loaded a worthy performer down with trophies.

Norah Jones, whose album, "Don't Know Why," won eight Grammys, mopped up at the awards show Sunday. In an awards competition notoriously governed by sales figures, a worthy artist was chosen this year, but the Grammys still don't have a feel for the true pulse of popular music.

The Grammy committee still ignores new artists who don't lay down some platinum for a major label. Independent artists and artists whose music doesn't suit radio stations for one reason or another are often shoved aside.

One of this year's most heinous decisions was that Coldplay's "A Rush of Blood to the Head" beat Beck's superior "Sea Change" for Best Alternative Music Album.

At least the soundtrack for "Behind the Music" didn't win that category. Don't laugh. It was nominated.

To see the reliance of the Grammy awards on established artists, one needs only to look at the category of Best Male Rock Performance. The nominees: David Bowie, Elvis Costello, Peter Gabriel, Robert Plant and Bruce Springsteen. None of them are under 40. What's rock 'n' roll about that?

Bruce Springsteen won, but he was the only one who deserved to be in the category. Don't get me wrong I love Costello and Bowie, and sometimes I even like Plant and Gabriel, but this is ridiculous. Bowie's "Heathen" was just plain bad, and so was Plant's "Dreamland." If the Grammy committee wants to invalidate the awards, they are doing a pretty good job of it.

As for hip-hop and R&B, the committee was closer to the mark, but that's probably only because Paul McCartney didn't release a collaboration with 50 Cent and Ja Rule. Eminem rightly won Best Rap Album, and India.Arie took home the best R&B album with tough competition from the likes of Musiq.

So why was I glad I watched the Grammys this year? Easy – the performances. Two considerable stand-out performances at this year's ceremony made the whole thing worth watching.

First of all, Simon and Garfunkel reunited to perform "Sound of Silence" to a hushed audience that proceeded to give them a thunderous standing ovation.

But that didn't prepare me for the show's finale.

Just before the show ended, Springsteen came onstage with Costello, Dave Grohl, Stevie Van Zandt and the bassist and drummer for No Doubt. As the first beat of the Clash's "London Calling" was struck, Springsteen said "This is for Joe," in tribute to recently deceased Clash guitarist and vocalist Joe Strummer.

It's moments like that all-star cover of "London Calling" that make up the love part of my love-hate relationship with awards shows.

Back to basics: Oprah will stick to classics as she revives her book club

Oprah's Book Club is back, and this time she's sticking to the classics.

Winfrey, who announced last April she was suspending her club because she could not find any worthy books, revealed Wednesday night that she was bringing back her club after a 10-month hiatus. She said she had been reading works by William Shakespeare, William Faulkner and Ernest Hemingway.

WTC | Professor's design selected

ground level, in the foundation of the original trade center. There are public spaces planned, Arens said, including a museum and Garden of the World. Additional commercial space is also planned.

Arens said Libeskind's design, which was chosen from 406 submissions, was drastically different from the THINK team's design.

"The committee was drawn to the treatment of public space on the site," Arens said, "and the organic nature of the project."

One aspect of the winning design, the Path of the Sun, allows sunlight to shine directly on the site between 8:46 and 10:28 a.m., the times the first plane hit until the second tower collapsed.

James Jones, head of the architecture department, said the university and the department were proud of Arens' work with the project.

"It's a testimony not only to Professor Arens' strength as a designer, but to the entire school as a design school," Jones said.

Jones said Arens was gone from the university for nearly two full years, working first with Libeskind on the expansion of a Denver museum.

Through his involvement with the Denver project, Arens was asked to help in the design for the World Trade Center site.

Arens spoke Wednesday in Kansas City about his experience on the design team, and will be giving a similar speech in Manhattan, Jones said.

The date and location of the talk have not been set, but Jones said the Manhattan Area Arts and Humanity Council, of which he is a member, would like to have Arens speak in a larger venue because the project has such a wide appeal.

"It's not just an architectural interest, or a K-State issue," Jones said, "but there's an interest in the broader public. We need to see that we find an appropriate venue."

In the meantime, Arens said he is excited to see the project grow – although he knows it probably won't be right away.

"We're beginning to work to bring this to fruition," Arens said. "Unfortunately, we're at the mercy of some economic forces in the country right now."

DEAD WEEK | Faculty Senate discusses possible changes in policy

quizzes and projects instead of just tests. Other conditions, like take-home finals, final projects and studio classes will be considered in the revision.

Spears said she expects the committee to pass the measure.

"Members of the committee had an opportunity to object at the meeting last week, but the only changes they requested were editorial changes to the policy – to make wording less ambiguous," she said.

Joyce Yagerline, arts and sciences faculty representative for the committee, said she can see both sides of the issue.

"I can see the students' point," she said. "From what I have heard, some professors give a lot of heavy-duty assignments in the week before finals.

But I can also see the other side – that some students use Dead Week as an excuse to party. It is up to the individual how they choose to spend their time."

Klingzell said that after years of student complaints, someone is finally doing something about the problem.

"Sometimes Faculty Senate is really opposed to change, but there are also some more progressive people who like to see things happen," he said. "Whatever gets passed will basically depend on how clear the piece is written and how well it answers the objections that a lot of teachers may have."

Yagerline said those concerns will be answered soon enough.

"Right now the question remains, 'If you're so swamped with papers and tests, how are you going to find time to study?'" she said. "On the other hand, if you are given the time to study, will you study – or will you just go and goof off?"

SENATE | Global Education Initiative to fund international scholarships allows students to connect with K-State.

"I think it says a lot to international students who just spent 26 hours on a plane to see a friendly face from K-State ready to meet them," he said.

Student Senate also passed a revision to the student activity fee funding regulations with a 35-9-0 vote.

Under the revision, a new College Council Allocations Committee would form, and college groups would no longer go to their college council to request funds.

All requests would go to the new allocations committee, comprised of one treasurer from each college, three at-large members and one member of the Senate Allocations Committee to serve as chair.

"This really opens up the process and allows more freedom," Allocations Chair Laurie Quaife said. "Groups can come and request regardless of which college they're from."

The revision will begin in the fall semester.

Student Senate

The following items were discussed:

- A resolution to support the Global Education Initiative passed with a 46-2-0 vote.
- A revision to the student activity fee funding regulations passed with a 35-9-0 vote.
- A bill to increase the Student Publications Inc. privilege fee was introduced.
- A bill to increase the privilege fee for the Office of Student Activities and Services was introduced.

GREEK DAY!!!

Faculty Member of the Month

Congratulations to February's Faculty of the Month recipient, Tom Roberts. Dean Roberts is currently serving as Assistant Dean of the College of Engineering, and is also an instructor for Personal & Professional Development and for Total Quality Management. The Sigma Chi fraternity nominated Dean Roberts for his commitment to education.

The Sigma Chi fraternity had nothing but good comments for Tom Roberts. They said that he always went the extra mile to make sure that every student understands the material in his classes. They also stated that his desire to give back to undergraduates is unequaled to anyone else on the campus.

Dean Roberts is a role model and collegiate innovator as well as an awesome faculty member and friend to members of the Sigma Chi fraternity. The Panhellenic and Interfraternity Executive councils would like to congratulate Tom Roberts and to thank him for his continued dedication to this university!He is an Assistant Professor in the College of Business Administration. If you are enrolled in Sports Marketing, Integrated Marketing Communications, or Marketing Behavior, please thank your teacher for his commitment to education at Kansas State University!

GREEK DAY! WITH THE LADY CATS

Greek Day with the Lady Cats The tremendous success of the K-State Women's Basketball team made sororities very proud to witness their victory against Texas on January 25, 2003. Approximately 300 sorority women came together to show the Greek community's support of the Women's Basketball team. At half time, a few houses were chosen to show of their signs that they made to support the team. Many of the signs supported the chapter's adopted player. In the Adopt-a-Player program, each sorority is paired up with a women's team member to cheer her on throughout the season. On behalf of the women of the Panhellenic Council, we would like to thank the Women's Basketball team and their coaches for allowing us to be a part of their amazing season.

New Committee Expands IFC Dry Rush Policy

In the last semester, the Interfraternity Council has adopted several policy changes. One of these changes has been the groundbreaking Recruitment Responsibility Committee (RRC) that has been placed in the Dry Rush Policy. "The RRC insures that chapters take accountability for their actions, making their events safer in the process," said Interfraternity Council Recruitment Coordinator Glen McMurry. This committee is responsible for ensuring dry recruitment practices as well as encouraging an enjoyable and safe recruitment experience. Consisting of around 20 members, the Recruitment Responsibility Committee visits and checks compliance of the Dry Rush Policy as well as assisting chapters and offering suggestions to better improve recruitment at Kansas State University.

Greek of the Month

Congratulations to February's Greek of the Month recipient, Kylie Siruta from Gamma Phi Beta. Kylie is a sophomore, majoring in Nutritional Sciences/Pre-Medicine and has a 3.82 GPA. After graduation, Kylie plans to attend medical school and eventually obtain a career as a physician in the field of pediatrics.

Kylie has held many positions in her chapter, including her current position as Chapter Relations/Standards Chairwoman and her position as Open House Day Chair during recruitment of 2002. She has also served on many chapter committees including the House Management Committee, the Gamma Phi Beta bible study, and as a member of the Public Relations Department. Outside of her sorority, Kylie is involved in many activities on campus including: Silver Key Sophomore Honorary, Ichthus Student Ministries, serving as a College of Human Ecology Ambassador, Kappa Omicron Nu, National Society of Collegiate Sudars and Silver Key Selections Committee.

During her time at Kansas State University, Kylie has received many awards including: the College of Human Ecology Honors Program, a Phi Kappa Phi Sophomore Scholastic award recipient, a dean's scholar award, Gamma Phi Beta's best kept secret, semester academic honors and an award for having the most merit points. Outside of all of her challenging academic and extra-curricular activities, Kylie enjoys spending time with friends, scrap-booking, watching movies, traveling and sports.

The members of the Panhellenic and Interfraternity Executive councils would like to congratulate Kylie Siruta and thank her for her outstanding contributions to the Greek community and Kansas State University as a whole. Keep up the good work!

participants how to eat right after the program ends and spring break is over.

"I looked at her food records, and they looked really good," she said. "Recording food intake is a way for her and myself to get a better idea of specific number of servings in each food group and get a feel for if they're meeting their serving requirements or not."

Fitness Consultant Stephanie Caouette, senior in kinesiology, said she increased Shufelberger's exercise routine.

"She increased her time for cardio, started doing upper-body strength training and is incorporating the ab roller," Caouette said.

Shufelberger's strength training includes two days of machine workouts, two days of free weights and two upper- and lower-body days each.

Stacy Jackson, freshman in biology and Shufelberger's roommate, said she too admires Shufelberger's efforts.

"I've always played sports and have always liked to exercise, but I'm not very good at eating healthy," she said.

Besides running, working on machines, weight lifting, Judo and intramural sports, Shufelberger also began doing water aerobics this week.

"I really liked going to water aerobics. It was a lot of fun," she said. "It was really different than land aerobics classes."

Shufelberger said working out in the water was good for her knee, which she injured during high school.

"Last year, I had some cartilage damage and had to have surgery on my knee," she said. "The water is really good on my joints."

Shufelberger said she would continue to try new ways to work out and keep it interesting.

The agenda for next week?

Water jogging.

TV | 'Manhattan Matters' to cover community news

Live." On "SNL," the audience can see the stage crew, the cameras and everything else, she said.

"When we leave the set, our audience will be able to see everyone and everything behind the set. We want to show people what goes on behind the scenes," Landholm said.

Lindsay Fair, student producer of the show and senior in mass communications, said the audience should see that TV shows are not seamless.

"It is a lot of different aspects all rolled into one," she said.

"It consists of a lot of people. It's a lot of work."

The producers also are trying to take a step away from commercial news, Fair said.

"We want something informal. We want something that is personalized, and we want to keep it within the community," she said.

Fair said "Manhattan Matters" will cover community and campus news, with no emphasis on state and national news.

Being involved in the show is a great opportunity for students, Fair said.

"It is good for students to get a hands-on experience," she said. "I have learned a lot about anchoring and producing, but I didn't know a lot about the other stuff. I've realized it takes a lot of different people to produce a show."

Landholm said there are about 35 students involved in the show's production.

The show is planned to run eight episodes, she said.

"Obviously we want to bring it back in the fall. If we have enough interest, we will continue to produce it in the summer," she said.

Tonight's episode will be rebroadcast at 12:30 p.m. and 8:30 p.m. Sunday.
